DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Weaver-Fox House is located at 3411 Main Street (Uniontown Road), in the picturesque village of Uniontown, seven miles west of Westminster, in Carroll County, Maryland. The house is sited on a deep sloping lot that is approximately 67 feet wide and 321 feet deep. Between the house and the street are four large maple trees, part of the two rows of maples which line both sides of the main thoroughfare. Adjacent to the Weaver-Fox House on the east side is a brick, one-story, mid-nineteenth century Methodist church. On the opposite side is an ell-shaped, mid-nineteenth century, two-story frame dwelling.

The architectural styling of the Weaver-Fox House is that of a simplified Victorian Italianate villa. Two stories high with a hipped roof, it has a tongue and groove board sheathed exterior with rusticated quoins on all four corners, a deep overhanging roof cornice and, on the roof, two chimneys flanking a rectangular, hipped roof cupola.

The five bay street facade is embellished with modillioned hoods over the door and windows, carved brackets decorating the roof cornice, and stylized arches and brackets on a full length, one-story porch. The centered entrance door and transom is framed by flat pilasters with stylized pseudo-panels at their base. The large (floor to ceiling) first floor windows and the smaller windows of the second floor all have 2/2 pane sash and louvered blinds.

On the west end of the house, positioned north of center, is a two-story, cantilevered bay window with brackets and flush molded panels. An absence of openings in the wall in the same area of the east end suggests a similar treatment might have been planned but was never executed. The three remaining windows of the side elevations continue the treatment of those of the facade except that the sash is of 4/4 panes. The cornice brackets of the facade, however, are not continued on the sides of the house. The ground level slopes down toward the rear of the house to give a full exposure to the brick-walled basement on the south elevation. A small, shuttered, 6/6 sash window at the basement level of each side elevation provides light and ventilation to the long summer kitchen occupying the rear (south) half of that level.

Including the fully exposed basement, the rear elevation is three stories high. Centered on the wall is a two-story frame extension (1886) built to contain bathrooms. Supported by one-story iron posts, it is covered with later "German siding." Centered beneath this addition is the cellar entrance, flanked by two 6/6 sash windows. On the two floor levels above the basement are four windows with simple, unornamented hoods, louvered blinds and 2/2 sash, two on each floor level flanking the bathroom wing.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Weaver-Fox House is a fine example of Victorian village architecture made even more notable by a large quantity of original furnishings and a location in a town still nineteenth century in appearance. Built during the years 1874 and 1875 as the home of Dr. Jacob J. Weaver, Jr., a country physician, the house was constructed in the style of the time and equipped with the most modern conveniences. It was furnished with pieces, also in the Victorian style, that were for the most part made by the many local cabinetmakers living in the area. Dr. Weaver was a prominent man in Uniontown and the surrounding rural community and his house and its contents were a reflection of that position.

Uniontown was founded during the first quarter of the nineteenth century and most of its buildings date from that period. It was quite a booming town at its beginning, its residents building a schoolhouse, two churches, and a Masonic Temple by 1825. A post office was established in 1813, and the town had its share of the necessary businesses, including a tannery, blacksmith shop, tavern, and store. The rapid growth of the town in the early nineteenth century was due to its location on the National Pike (see Old National Pike Milestones National Register of Historic Places) leading from Baltimore to Cumberland which was then becoming increasingly traveled.

The continuance of the economic boom of the first decades of the nineteenth century was prevented by two later occurrences. In 1835 and 1836 plans were laid and executed for the formation of Carroll County from parts of Baltimore and Frederick Counties. It was hoped that Uniontown would become the seat of the new county, but Westminster was chosen instead due to its location more towards the center of the county. When the Western Maryland Railroad was constructed in the county in the 1850's, it passed through Westminster, causing the traffic through Uniontown to slacken considerably. The town never recovered its previous growth rate, but became instead the quiet center of activities in this part of Carroll County. Thus, Uniontown has visually remained a nineteenth century town with only a few new buildings dating from after 1900. It is the perfect setting for the display of a building such as the Weaver-Fox House, itself an integral part of this nineteenth century townscape.

Dr. Jacob J. Weaver, Jr. was born in Uniontown in 1848. He attended Gettysburg College and then the University of Maryland medical school. He

The cupola crowning the tin -sheathed roof is treated in a manner similar to the house. It is also of tongue and groove boards and has rusticated quoins, a hipped roof with finial, and brackets on the window hoods and eave cornice.

The first floor room configuration (see attached plans) consists of a short, centered stair hall at the front of the house that is flanked by two equal-sized parlors with fireplaces. In the rear of the house is a large kitchen and a smaller library. On the first floor level of the rear extension is a sunroom and bath, the latter added in circa 1938.

On the second floor are four bedchambers, a small dressing room and, in the extension, a large bath. In the cellar there is a summer kitchen which extends its full width and half its depth on the south side. The north half of the cellar is divided into two commodious storage areas.

In addition to the stair in the entrance hall, there is a secondary stair between the first floor kitchen and the second floor, a cellar stair beneath the kitchen stair, and a stair to the cupola and the garret at the head of the second floor hall.

The woodwork throughout the house, including window and door surrounds, is exceedingly simple in profile. Decoration is confined to the paneled stair closet and turned balusters, ornamental plaster ceiling medallions and hand-grained woodwork in the dining room (west parlor), library, master bedroom, and first and second floor stair halls.

One of the most interesting aspects of the Weaver-Fox House is that it contains most of its original furnishings, including lighting fixtures and a Belgian carpet. Other notable features include bathrooms, among the first in the area, which retain their original porcelain fixtures and wainscoted walls.

graduated from the latter in 1870 and began practicing medicine with his father in that year. Dr. J. J. Weaver, Sr. was an 1846 graduate of the University of Pennsylvania medical school who practiced in Uniontown from 1848 until 1880.

In 1867, Dr. Weaver, Jr. married Mary Jones Haines of Forrest Home, a property three and one-half miles from Uniontown. The Weavers lived for a time with Dr. Weaver, Sr. in a large, white, board and batten house at what is now 3406 Main Street (Uniontown Road). Then in 1874, work was begun across the street on what is now know as the Weaver-Fox House at 3411 Uniontown Road. The work was done by local builders on the site. Shutters were made there and graining painted on the woodwork in the parlor, library, entrance hall, dining room, and master bedroom.

Much of the furniture for the house, which was purchased in 1874 and 1875 from skilled local craftsmen, still remains in it today. Some pieces were brought from the senior Weavers' home across the street in 1899. Before electricity was installed in the house in 1917, it was lighted by coal oil lamps and chandeliers and candles. Iron and isin-glass Latrobe stoves, now gone, were set in front of the fireplaces in the parlor and dining room to heat the house. A hot water boiler was used to heat the bathroom.

Dr. Weaver, Jr. practiced medicine in Uniontown from 1870 until 1887. Poor health thereafter prevented him from continuing in this profession and he became a banker. He was President of the Carroll County Savings Institution in Uniontown, the Carroll County Bank and Trust Company in Westminster, and the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Carroll County in Westminster. He also served as the Vice President of the Taneytown Bank and Trust Company. In addition to medicine and banking, Dr. Weaver engaged in farming on a small scale, owning several acres just outside Uniontown on which corn, wheat, and timothy were grown.

Dr. Weaver, Jr. and his wife had only one child, Florence Eyster Weaver. She attended Miss Bond's School in Baltimore and the Luther-ville Female Seminary in Baltimore County. In 1898 she married Edmund Kelly Fox in the parlor of the Weaver-Fox House. After their marriage, they lived in Washington, D. C., spending only the summers in Union-town.

The Foxes had two daughters, Dr. Grace E. Fox, born in 1899, and Mary Weaver Fox (Mrs. Charles Raymond Whittlesey), born in 1901. Dr. Fox, a retired history professor and author of several books on China and Japan, is the present owner of the house, which she occupies only during the summer months.
