Description:

The West Point Hotel is a two-story frame commercial building constructed ca. 1900. The hotel was built with influences of the Dutch Colonial style as seen in the gambrel roof and simple colonial revival features. On the main (north) and west facades is a two-story porch with square and chamfered posts and square balusters in the railing. Doors are original glass and frame with single and two-light transoms. On the main facade of the first story are large nine light fixed windows. Other windows in the hotel are one-over-one sash. The hotel has a gambrel roof of composition roofing, a brick foundation and weatherboard siding. Much of the original interior floor plan and woodwork is also intact. There are no outbuildings.

Period of Significance: ca. 1900 - ca. 1930

Area of Significance: Commerce/Architecture

Criterion: A and C

Architect/Builder: Unknown

Statement of Significance:

The West Point Hotel is notable in the commercial history of West Point and for its architectural design. The building was constructed in ca. 1900 to take advantage of the increased use of the adjacent Louisville and Nashville Turnpike. The exact builder and original owner is unknown. The building operated as a hotel for many years before becoming a boarding house in the 1930s. It is the only remaining hotel in West Point and has not been altered. Its gambrel roof and colonial detailing show the influence of the Dutch Colonial style. The hotel is the only commercial building constructed with Dutch Colonial influences in the county.

Acreage: Less than one acre.
