DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Built by Sam Houston in 1847, "Woodland" was occupied by him and his wife until 1859 when he was deposed as Governor of the State of Texas. Houston exchanged part of his property at Raven Hill for "Woodland" which, in 1847, was no more than a small log cabin with a chimney of mud and sticks.* That year Houston added an open hallway and a second log room to the end of the hallway or "dog-trot." A porch was built across the front. Above the two front rooms was a loft, probably for the house servants until the quarters were finished. Plank doors and flat nails detailed the Houston House at first but later siding was added. Painted white today, originally the weatherboarding was probably whitewashed.

The house was further enlarged the following spring. The loft was converted into two bedrooms separated by a grilled breezeway. A steep enclosed staircase was added from the lower to the upper hallway. At this time the front seems to have become the back: two windowless rooms were partitioned at opposite ends of the garden porch, leaving between them a loggia for summer dining. The open back of the hall was embellished by the addition of a pediment and portico of four square columns.

Two one-room, gabled, square log outbuildings stand on the grounds. One, a kitchen, is a reconstruction; the other, merely restored, served as Houston's law office. "Woodlands" is owned by the State of Texas and open to the public.

The boundaries are co-terminus with the State park and include "Woodlands" with its outbuildings, the so-called "Steamboat House" to which Houston retired and died and the land of the State park. The Sam Houston Memorial and the "War and Peace" museums are non-historic features. The inclusion of all parkland is essential to the protective screening of the houses and their setting reminiscent of the historic 170-acre estate maintained by Houston.

"Woodland" was the residence of Sam Houston from 1847 to 1859, a most eventful period in the life of one of America's mythic heroes. This "bang up place," as Houston called it, was the statesman's house and law office during his two terms as United States Senator and where he lived when elected Governor of Texas in 1859.

As the victor of San Jacinto, Houston fathered Texas independence. Overwhelmingly elected first President of the Republic in 1836, he served in that capacity again from 1841 to 1844 gaining international recognition for Texas and leading the Republic into union with the United States, an act which enlarged the country by one-third of its present land mass.

"Woodland," this typical Texas hill country cottage of clapboard over logs, was his refuge from the political confrontations raging in Washington and Austin fanned by extremist and contrary visions of secession and abolitionism. A staunch unionist, he was the only southern Senator to support all the compromise measures of 1850. Through the decade of the 1850s, he tried vainly but courageously to stem the inexorable tide of secession. As Governor, in 1861 he refused to recognize the authority of the State's secession convention and was deposed.

Biography

Samuel Houston, soldier, frontier hero and statesman of Texas, was born in 1793 near Lexington, Virginia. After his father's death, the family moved to Maryville, Tennessee, near the coveted lands of the Cherokee. Houston spent much of his youth with the Indians learning their language and customs and developing a deep sympathy for their character. He had very little formal education and in 1813 volunteered for service in the war against Britain. He served under Andrew Jackson at Horseshoe Bend.

In 1818, Houston resigned from the army to study and practice law in Tennessee. He served two terms in Congress before he was elected Governor of Tennessee (1827). Two years later, when his bride of a

Sam Houston House (Woodland)

Few months left him, he resigned his office and went to Indian country (Oklahoma), where he established a trading post called the Wigwam. Like other traders, he was advisor to the Indians, making yearly trips to Washington to plead their cause. By 1833 he was in Texas.

Houston had little to do with the preliminaries of the Texas revolution, though he watched the struggle closely. He was a member of the convention which established a provisional government in Texas and sent Stephen Austin to Mexico to secure statehood. When Texas declared independence in 1836, Houston was present at that convention. With his commanding presence (he stood 6' 2") and capacity to arouse confidence and enthusiasm, he was promptly made commander of the local volunteers and then of the Texas regular army. After the fall of the Alamo, Houston retreated before Santa Ana amid much criticism. However, he redeemed himself briefly a few weeks later when he surprised a superior Mexican army at San Jacinto and killed or captured the entire force while Santa Ana was taken prisoner.

In 1836, Houston was elected President of the new Republic and his 2-year term was comparatively uneventful. He succeeded in obtaining recognition from Britain, France, and the United States, though he really wanted annexation by the United States.

When he was re-elected in 1841, the national debt was nearly 7 million dollars, the Indians were in an ugly mood and Mexico showed signs of renewing the war. When he retired from office in 1844, Texas was relatively prosperous and annexation was fairly certain. In 1846 he represented the new State of Texas in the Senate, where he served for nearly 14 years.

Houston was a lonely figure among his southern colleagues. He was a strong believer in the Union and Indian rights and he was the only southern Senator to vote for all the compromise measures of 1850. In 1859 he was elected Governor of Texas on a platform of preserving the Union and tried to prevent the State's secession. When secession was accepted by a large popular vote, he believed that it did not necessarily mean adherence to the Confederacy. He considered Texas an independent republic again and refused to take the oath of allegiance to the Confederate Government. He was deposed.

Houston refused the aid of Union soldiers to reestablish his lost authority and retired quietly to Huntsville, where he died 3 weeks after the fall of Vicksburg.
