Description of present and historic physical appearance:

Candler Park Historic District is a large, intact, residential neighborhood east of downtown Atlanta. The neighborhood began as the independent community of Edgewood, which grew up along the Georgia Railroad in the 1870s, was incorporated in 1899, and was annexed into the city of Atlanta in 1909. The district is centered around Candler Park, a large city park developed in 1922 on land conveyed to the city by the Edgewood Park Realty Company. The district was laid out in a grid-iron plan with clearly defined primary and secondary streets and uniform setbacks. The earliest houses, generally Queen Anne- and Folk Victorian-style one- and two-story frame houses dating from the late 19th century, are scattered throughout the western portion of the district. As the neighborhood developed to the east, Craftsman-style wood-frame bungalows predominate. East of the park, houses date from the 1920s through the 1940s. These houses are predominately brick and include Craftsman-style bungalows and English Vernacular Revival-style cottages. A majority of the houses in the district were constructed before World War II, however throughout the district are scattered American Small Houses built in the 1940s that are now contributing resources to the district. The northern boundary of the district is extended with this amendment to include apartment buildings built in the late 1940s as part of the post-war housing boom in Atlanta. Community landmark buildings in the district include several churches, the 1926 Mary Lin School, and clusters of 1920s corner stores. Landscaping in the district is characterized by informally landscaped yards, street trees, sidewalks, retaining walls, and curbs. In recent years, the neighborhood has experienced the increased popularity of "in-town" living, and a number of houses that were originally contributing to the district are now noncontributing due to the addition of second stories and significant additions and alterations to their original form.

National Register of Historic Places Continuation Sheet

Section 7--Description

This amendment increases the northern boundary of the district to include apartment buildings and houses constructed in the 1940s and 1950s. In addition, buildings that did not meet the 50-year age requirement in the existing nomination were reevaluated for National Register eligibility. Also, each property within the existing boundary was reevaluated for National Register eligibility.

The newly added and newly reclassified contributing houses and apartments are located throughout the district and reflect the simpler, less ornamented residential styles and types built in the 1930s through early 1950s. The majority of the houses are American Small House-type cottages, one- or one-and-a-half-stories, frame or brick houses nearly square or rectangular in form; tightly massed with a front porch, stoop, side porch, and/or side garage; and simple ornamentation. The apartment buildings added to the district are characterized as modern apartment complexes built between the 1930s and 1950s with several individual multi-apartment buildings arranged in a landscaped setting.

Previously noncontributing buildings, now contributing (additional documentation)

The original period of significance for the Candler Park Historic District ended in 1983 (the end of the 50-year age requirement). This amendment extends the period of significance to 1955 (the current 50-year age requirement) to include the now-historic resources associated with the continued development of Candler Park. As in the rest of the state, building construction decreased during the Depression, and few houses were built in Candler Park during the mid- to late 1930s. The post World War II years created a rapid need for new residential construction in Atlanta, as in cities throughout the United States. Although Candler Park was mostly developed during the 1920s, several American Small Houses were constructed in the neighborhood in the 1940s and 1950s.

One example of an early 1950s house is the one-story brick house located at 1370 Miller Avenue built in 1953 (photograph 33, left). The house can be characterized as an early transition from a bungalow (see photograph 33, right) to the longer, lower form of a ranch house. This house features a low, hipped roof with extended eaves and a more rectangular front façade than the bungalow next door. However, this particular house retains a front porch reminiscent of the earlier bungalow designs rather than the more typical front-porch-less ranch house.

Another example of a post World War II-era house in the district is the American Small House located at 614 Page Avenue (photograph 39, left). The one-story, brick house with a side-gable roof is typical of the American Small House-type houses constructed during the 1940s and early 1950s with minimal decorative elements and a small three- to five-room floor plan.

The following is a list of buildings that were previously listed as noncontributing (because of not meeting the 50-year age requirement at the time of the original nomination) and are now listed as contributing:

Noncontributing, nonhistoric buildings (additional documentation)

The noncontributing, nonhistoric resources throughout the district are buildings built outside of the amended period of significance (after 1955) and are generally houses constructed in the 1980s through the present day on vacant lots (that were marked as vacant on the 1983 Candler Park

Previously contributing, status changed to noncontributing (additional documentation)

Two examples of previously contributing buildings that are now noncontributing due to extensive alterations to the historic form and materials of a historic building are located at 318 and 324 Arizona Avenue (photograph 51). The bungalow at 318 Arizona Avenue is no longer contributing to the district because of extensive alterations to its historic materials (now nonhistoric stucco) and removal of character-defining features such as historic windows and doors, ornamental detailing, and removal of its original front porch. The bungalow at 324 Arizona Avenue is no longer contributing to the district because of extensive additions and alterations and because a large second-story "pop-up" addition was added and the original front porch reconfigured.

Another two examples are the two shotgun-type houses located at 484 and 486 Candler Park Drive. The shotguns are unique to the district but because of nonhistoric, noncompatible modern, two-story additions are no longer considered contributing to the district (photograph 36).

There have been a few "tear-downs" of historic buildings to replace them with larger, modern houses in this popular in-town neighborhood. An example of a row of new, modern, noncontributing houses, which replaced historic contributing houses, is located on Casson Street (photograph 54). Another example is the two-story, nonhistoric house located at 292 Candler Street (photograph 31, left).

Newly added contributing buildings through boundary increases:

This amendment to the Candler Park Historic District increases the boundary in two areas. The first boundary increase is less than one acre and includes two historic, contributing houses on the north side of Mansfield Road that were left out of the original district boundary even though the houses were constructed within the original period of significance.

The second boundary increase is located east of Sterling Avenue, roughly along Benning Place and is bounded on the north by Freedom Parkway. This area was originally excluded from the district because of houses and apartment complexes in the area that had not reached 50 years of age at the time of the original district nomination. The second boundary increase includes 70 contributing buildings, one contributing site, and 16 noncontributing buildings. These resources are now eligible for listing in the National Register and are typical of the types and styles of historic houses and apartments constructed in Georgia from the mid-1930s through the early 1950s. Single-family houses in the amended area are typically one-story, brick or frame, American Small House-type houses (photographs 1-5). The houses are modest, small houses with minimal decorative elements in the Craftsman (photograph 6, left), English Vernacular Revival (photograph 9), or Colonial Revival (photograph 8, right) styles or may have no references to previous architectural styles (photograph 10).

This boundary increase also includes Goldsboro Park, which was built before 1950 by the city of Atlanta as a neighborhood park (photograph 11), the Goldsboro Apartments (photograph 11), and the Benning Place Apartments (formerly known as the Euclid Court Apartments) (photographs 12-14). The Goldsboro Apartments and Benning Place Apartments are examples of the modern apartment complexes that were built in Atlanta between the 1930s and 1950s. Modern apartment complexes are defined in the draft statewide historic context Georgia's Modern Apartment Complexes as having at least three multi-apartment buildings developed on a relatively large scale using an overall site plan with integral landscaping. Built in 1949, the Goldsboro Apartments is an eleven-building complex with Colonial Revival details and brick veneer. The Benning Place Apartments (Euclid Court Apartments) is a grouping of twenty-five, two-story, brick, buildings with a central entrance. Both complexes are typical of the apartment complexes built in Atlanta during the 1940s.

National Register of Historic Places Continuation Sheet

Section 7--Description

Section 8—Statement of Significance

Statement of significance (areas of significance)

Located east of downtown Atlanta, the Candler Park Historic District is a large, middle- and working-class, residential neighborhood that developed from the late 19th century through the mid-20th century. This amendment: 1) extends the period of significance to 1955; 2) expands the boundaries to include contributing resources built between 1933 and 1955; and 3) reevaluates the National Register eligibility of each property in the amended historic district.

Candler Park Historic District, as amended, is significant as a late 19th- and early-to-mid-20th-century residential neighborhood that evolved from an independent town along the Georgia Railroad into a streetcar suburb of Atlanta.

The district is significant in the area of architecture for its excellent collection of houses and community landmark buildings representative of architectural styles and types built in Georgia during the late 19th through the mid-20th centuries in Georgia. This amendment to the original historic district increases the period of significance for the area of architecture to include resources built through the end of the historic period (1955). The district has excellent examples of the American Small House type, which were built after World War II. American Small Houses were built in large numbers to relieve the housing shortages in the 1940s and 1950s and are characterized by their small square or rectangular plan, tight massing, and minimal details. The houses along the north end of Candler Park Drive (photographs 1-2) are good examples of the American Small House in the district. The two apartment complexes added to the district, the Goldsboro Apartments and the Benning Place Apartments, are excellent examples of the Modern Apartment-type complexes. Built in the 1940s through the 1950s, Modern Apartment complexes are defined in the draft statewide historic context Georgia's Modern Apartment Complexes as having three or more separate multi-apartment buildings developed with an overall site plan with integral landscaping. The 1949 Goldsboro Apartments are an excellent example of the Modern Apartment-type with its eleven buildings situated on a large lot with ornamental trees and large expanses of lawn.

The district, as amended, is significant in the area of community planning and development as an independent suburban community that developed along a railroad in the late 19th century then further developed as a streetcar suburb with two streetcar lines running through its grid-iron plan. Growth in the district was further developed during the early 20th century with the introduction of the automobile. The area developed rapidly during the 1910s into the 1930s and from the mid-1940s into the 1950s as a middle-class white neighborhood. This amendment to the original historic district increases the period of significance for the area of community planning and development to include the continued development of the neighborhood as a suburb of the city of Atlanta through the end of the historic period (1955).

National Register of Historic Places Continuation Sheet

Section 8—Statement of Significance

National Register Criteria

The Candler Park Historic District is eligible for listing in the National Register of Historic Places under Criterion A in the area of community planning and development as an independent community that was incorporated into the Atlanta city limits as a streetcar suburb. The district is eligible for listing under Criterion C in the area of architecture for its excellent collection of intact, historic residential, commercial, and community landmark resources representing common types and styles built in Georgia from c.1870 through 1955.

Criteria Considerations (if applicable)

N/A

Period of significance (justification)

The period of significance begins with c.1870 and this amended nomination extends the period of significance from 1933 to 1955 to include buildings constructed in the neighborhood through the end of the historic period.

Contributing/Noncontributing Resources (explanation, if necessary)

N/A

Developmental history/historic context (if appropriate)

(NOTE: The history of Candler Park from the beginning of its development c.1870 through the 1930s is contained in the original National Register nomination for the Candler Park Historic District listed in 1983.)

Candler Park remained a stable middle-class neighborhood until after World War II. With middle-class flight to the suburbs in the 1950s and 1960s, once stable intown areas such as Candler Park began to decline. However in recent years, due to increased traffic and congestion and long commute times in the Atlanta metropolitan region, Candler Park as well as other intown neighborhoods have recently enjoyed a resurgence of popularity and population. Candler Park is once again the stable, middle-class enclave that it originally was.

The majority of houses in the area were built before World War II. Very few houses were constructed during the 1930s and 1940s. A few American Small Houses and several apartment buildings were constructed in the late 1940s as part of the post-war housing boom including the Euclid Court Apartments (now called Benning Place Apartments).

National Register of Historic Places Continuation Sheet

Section 8—Statement of Significance

In the 1960s and 1970s with the rapid population growth of the Atlanta metropolitan region and new highways bringing increased mobility, neighborhoods further from the central city became more desirable. Increasingly, there were less owner-occupied housing in Candler Park, and many of the larger houses were subdivided into rental apartments.

During the 1960s, numerous buildings on the northern boundary of the Candler park neighborhood near North Avenue (outside of the district) were demolished for a proposed highway called I-485. Increased pressure from citizens stalled the highway project, which would have devastated many of Atlanta's historic streetcar and early automobile neighborhoods, and I-485 was never built. The portion of the neighborhood that was cleared near North Avenue became a four-lane divided road called Freedom Parkway.
