Description Summary:

The Abell House, constructed c. 1910, is a two-story, three bay frame dwelling situated on the east side of Washington Street in Leonardtown, Maryland. Positioned near the former location of the Leonardtown wharf, the house commands sweeping views of Breton Bay, a sheltered harbor of the Potomac River. The house demonstrates the eclecticism characteristic of Victorian era architecture in St. Mary's County, exhibiting a vernacular interpretation of the Queen Anne style in its asymmetrical massing, bracketed eaves, multiple cross gables, and pendants. Side and rear porches were enclosed in the late twentieth century and all of the interior plaster and mantels have been removed pending a rehabilitation effort that commenced in 2003. The property also includes a non-contributing concrete-lined pool.

General Description:

Oriented on a west/east axis, the principal elevation of the dwelling faces west towards Washington Street. Situated on a 0.533 acre, rectangular-shaped lot, the Abell House is located near the southern terminus of Washington Street near the site of the former Leonardtown wharf. The property is bounded on the north by a right-of-way that extends eastward to the Sparks/Holley House (c. 1890, SM-539). On the east side, the property's perimeter is ringed by a metal picket fence. A large parking lot and metal picket fence lie to the south of the house. To the west, the property is bounded by a metal picket fence, sidewalk, and Washington Street. In addition to the house, the lot contains a non-contributing, oval-shaped concrete-lined pool. The pool is entirely encircled by metal and wood fencing.

The Abell House is a two story frame dwelling with a one-story kitchen wing, constructed ca. 1910. The dwelling features an asymmetrical massing that roughly forms an L-shape. The house's braced, circular sawn frame originally rested on a brick pier foundation. The spaces between the piers along the exterior perimeter of the building have since been filled in with brick. The exterior of the building was originally sheathed with weatherboard fastened with wire nails. This material, however, is currently covered with aluminum siding. The roof, which is pierced by a single, centrally located chimney flue, is covered with asphalt shingles.

The fenestration of the principal (west) elevation of the main block consists of a door and two windows. The windows each contain two-over-two, double-hung sash (all of the louvered shutters have been removed). The door consists of three rectangular panels topped by a large glass pane. This entrance is flanked by sidelights and topped by a three-pane transom. All of these openings are shaded by a wrap-around porch with a concrete floor. The porch is embellished with turned posts and scroll-sawn brackets. As the porch wraps around the north side of the house, it leads to a second entry into the rear room of the original dwelling. This is a six panel-over-one pane door. Immediately to the north of the door is a two-over-two window. The west side of the kitchen wing is pierced by a two-over-two window. The second floor of the main block is pierced by three two-over-two windows. Another two-over-two window lies just above the north porch, as well. The wide overhanging eaves are decorated with scroll-sawn brackets that are found on every elevation of the house. A single cross gable projects from the roof and is adorned by a four-sided, pyramidal shaped pendent. The cross gable is fenestrated by a single pane window with a triangular crown.

The south elevation of the Abell house consists of three different sections. The first or westernmost section is two stories with two-over-two windows on the first and second stories. This is topped by a cross gable adorned with a single pane window with a triangular crown and a pendant. The second section of the elevation, slightly set back from the front block, also exhibits a cross gable, pendant, and two windows on the second floor, but the first floor is pierced by two sets of paired six-over-six windows. Historic maps and architectural evidence reveal that this was once a porch that was actually recessed below living space on the second floor. This porch was later enclosed. The third section of the elevation originally served as the rear porch, but it too was enclosed within the past two decades.

The rear or east elevation has been extensively modified on the first floor. While enclosing an original porch, the first floor of the elevation is pierced by a series of three large, thermalpane windows and a modern thermalpane door. To the north of these openings is a modern wood door. The second floor of the east elevation is pierced by four two-over-two windows. A cross gable projects from the roof and is pierced by a window with a triangular crown. A pendant rises from the peak. A small projection from the kitchen's rear wall is fenestrated by two four-pane windows that are actually hinged and open outward.

The north elevation of the main block is unfenestrated on the first floor. The second floor of the front section has a two-over-two window, while the rear section features a distinctive stained glass window with a floral design. It remains unclear whether this window is original to the house. The kitchen wing is lit by one two-over-two window. All of the gables are decorated with pendants and small windows with triangular crowns.

The interior of the Abell House follows an asymmetrical plan. Immediately upon entering the main door of the dwelling, visitors are greeted by a stair passage that measures approximately seven feet wide. The closed string stair is embellished with a turned newel and balusters. The space also permits entry into a parlor, as well as another living space in the rear of the house. Interestingly, a trap door, now removed, was once located in the rear of the passage. The parlor originally featured a door to a covered porch (now enclosed) as well as a door to the rear room. The parlor was heated by a stove flue. Although presently surrounded by enclosed porches, the rear room was originally fenestrated by four windows with sweeping views of Breton Bay. Interestingly this space contained doors to the north porch as well as a small service stair/bathroom. The stair and bathroom were entirely sheathed with vertical beaded board (both the stair and beaded board are to be removed). This intermediary space served as a transitional area between the main living areas of the house and the north kitchen. The kitchen consisted of a single room heated by a stove flue and a small pantry situated on this wing's east side.

The second floor of the house consists of a stair passage and hall that leads to the rear service stair. The stair itself is ringed by a rail and turned balusters. It also permits entry into all three of the house's bedrooms. The rear stair, entirely sheathed with vertical beaded board, descends to the first floor. Above the stair is a bathroom. A small attic space above the kitchen presently serves as storage.

The building exhibits a good level of integrity, particularly on the exterior, allowing it to stand as a representative example of Victorian-era domestic architecture in St. Mary's County. The interior plaster, some doors, and all mantels have been removed pending rehabilitation. The overall plan, much of the fenestration, the main staircase, and the exterior architectural details will be retained, but the rear service stair will be removed due to its lack of compliance with modern building codes.

Summary Statement of Significance:

The Abell House is significant under National Register Criterion C for its architectural character, exemplifying the eclecticism of Victorian-era domestic vernacular architecture in St. Mary's County, Maryland. The dwelling's asymmetrical massing, bracketed eaves, multiple cross gables, and pendants are inspired by the Queen Anne style. Overlooking Breton Bay near the southern end of Washington Street in Leonardtown, the house is reminiscent of the waterfront development that characterized the area beginning in the mid-1880s but has since vanished. The house derives additional significance under Criterion B for its association with Enoch B. Abell, a significant local political leader, attorney, and entrepreneur who was integral in developing Leonardtown's waterfront area into a terminus for steamboats plying the Potomac River.

The period of significance, ca. 1910-1924, spans the period of Enoch B. Abell's association with the house, beginning with the date of construction and ending with Abell's death in December 1924.

Resource History and Historic Context:

Just prior to the Civil War, in 1858, Leonardtown became an incorporated municipality with a degree of self-governance. Almost immediately thereafter, in 1861, the community sought to improve its overall appearance by establishing a number of nuisance laws, including banning unattended livestock from the streets. During the Civil War the community was occupied by Union troops. Despite noting that the county had been left in a position of "pitiful prostration" following the conflict, the St. Mary's Beacon heralded that improvements to the village, both architectural and commercial, had already surpassed those occurring elsewhere in Southern Maryland such as Prince Frederick, Upper Marlboro, and Port Tobacco.¹ Indeed, Leonardtown was rapidly becoming a regional commercial center.

Strategically located overlooking Breton Bay, a sheltered anchorage off of the Potomac River, the town had intermittently served as a tobacco inspection point and by the mid-nineteenth century, a center for steamboat commerce. An 1859 plat of the town, however, indicates that development around the water was somewhat limited as only a few houses and a wharf were clustered around the water. By 1885, however, the Leonardtown Joint Stock and Transportation

Company (LJS & T) purchased the wharf property and immediately began a more intensive development of the town's waterfront.²

Enoch B. Abell, a prominent local political leader and attorney, was on the Board of Directors of the LJS & T. Born on December 13, 1855, Abell received his A.B. degree at Georgetown University in 1877 and was admitted to the Maryland Bar in 1880. While trained in the law, Abell soon distinguished himself as a private investor as well as a public servant. In 1883 Abell, along with Frank Neale Holmes, founded the St. Mary's Enterprise, a Republican weekly newspaper, which he also edited. After Holmes' death in June 1896 Abell continued to publish the Enterprise until his death on December 13, 1924. From 1897 to 1921 Abell served as the Clerk of the Circuit Court for St. Mary's County. He also served on the Board of Directors of the Southern Maryland Telephone Company and St. Mary's Hospital.³

In 1906, while Abell and his wife Katherine Camalier were living in the middle of town overlooking the main square,⁴ Abell purchased a house lot from Laura W. Holmes, the widow of his business partner Frank Neale Holmes, at the southern end of Washington Street overlooking Breton Bay.⁵ The deed specifically prohibited Abell from building a steamboat wharf on the property unless the Leonardtown Joint Stock and Transportation Company went out of business.⁶ The property was situated down a long incline from the main part of Leonardtown along Washington Street in an area called by locals "Frogtown."⁷ Indeed, much of the shoreline, and even some of the lower lying areas in that vicinity were marshland as depicted in a 1936 plat.

According to the Abells' grandson Eddie Stokel, the dwelling was not erected until the 1910s.⁸ Katherine Abell reportedly suffered a stroke during this time and her husband believed it would be therapeutic for her to occasionally reside in a new house by the waters of Breton Bay. Apparently, Katherine did not like the arrangement and the house was subsequently rented out until both Katherine and Enoch Abell died in 1924.

The house that the Abells built represented an excellent example of the eclecticism that characterized domestic architecture in Leonardtown, seat of St. Mary's County, during the Victorian era. The three-bay, two-story dwelling featured an asymmetrical massing, a wide eave, scroll sawn brackets, multiple cross gables topped with pendants as well as porches on each elevation. Influenced by the Queen Anne style, the house was among the most stylish in Frogtown. Enoch Abell was also behind the construction of two neighboring dwellings: the Italianate-styled St. Mary's Ice and Fuel Company (c. 1900, SM-347, demolished) as well as the Shaw House (c. 1900, SM-535, demolished).

The architectural details of the Abell House were consistent with other dwellings erected in Leonardtown during the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth centuries.⁹ The Fenwick House (1898, 1910s, SM-365) in Leonardtown, for instance, was an amalgamation of Queen Anne details. The house contained a corbelled chimney, turret, wrap around porch, and cross gables replete with pendants identical to those found at the Abell House. Much closer to the Abell House was the neighboring Sparks/Holley House (c. 1890s, SM-539). Although modified, the Sparks/Holley house still retains its brackets and cross gable with fish scale siding. Closely mirroring the bracketing of the Abell House was the neighboring St. Mary's Ice and Fuel Company building. As all of these houses relate, the Queen Anne style was expressed in a number of different ways over at least two or three decades in Leonardtown. The style came to characterize the town's prosperity. The building boom in town, however, would soon slow.

With the proliferation of motor vehicles and the concurrent improvement of road surfaces in the early 20th century, steam travel and commerce soon became obsolete. By the 1930s, the last steamboat runs were being made on both the Potomac and Patuxent Rivers. As a result, development along Leonardtown's waterfront dramatically slowed by the 1930s. Indeed, from the death of Enoch and Katherine Abell in 1924 until 1955, the property remained in the hands of the couple's heirs. In 1955, the property was sold to Richard L. and Cecilia T. Curry.¹⁰ In 1961, the Currys sold the property to Robert W. and Jean S. Jager.¹¹ The couple owned the property until 1986 when it was combined with the neighboring St. Mary's Ice and Fuel Company property to the south.¹² In 1988, the property was once again subdivided and sold to Joseph E. and Linda S. Gill who in turn sold it to Leonardtown Landing LLC in 2002.¹³ On January 22, 2003, the property was sold to its present owner RAR Associates Development Company.¹⁴

Despite modifications in the mid-twentieth century through the enclosing of its south and east porches and the interior work associated with the current rehabilitation, the Abell House retains integrity to reflect its Queen Anne influence, and its setting adjacent to the site of the former steamship wharf recalls a significant era in the region's history of transportation and commerce. Most of the historic resources associated with steamship wharves, marine railways, and waterfront communities in St. Mary's County, Maryland no longer exist.¹⁵ The dwelling's integrity of materials, setting, location, as well as feeling all contribute to its ability to recall the peak of Leonardtown's "improvement" and the development of the community's waterfront during the steamship era. It is also the only dwelling remaining in Leonardtown associated with Enoch B. and Katherine Abell, as their principal residence on the town square, the Shaw house, and the St. Mary's Ice and Fuel Company building have all been demolished.
