DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Killiaen Van Rensselaer was one of the most successful of the Dutch patroons, who although he never even visited his holding in North America, nevertheless contributed directly to the settlement of the Hudson Valley in the 17th and 18th centuries.

The Dutch occupied the upper Hudson valley for trade with the Indians shortly after Henry Hudson's famous 1609 voyage in the Half Moon. After 1629, the Dutch used a unique system to encourage settlement, known as Patroonship. By this system, wealthy Dutch merchants controlled extensive tracts of land, provided they encouraged settlement of the area by providing passage to the continent, supplies, and protection for the farmers. The merchants stood to reap their profits from both the new farming, and also the fur trade in the area.

Van Rensselaer acquired 700,000 acres in the area around today's Albany and Rensselaer Counties, and his patroon was known as Rensselaerwyck. Parts of the huge estate were called after Van Rensselaer's holdings in Holland. Crailo is just one of those areas, referring to the Dutch word meaning Crow's Woods. It was the nucleus of an area known as Greynen Bosch (Green Bush) because of the impressive stands of Virgin Pines there.

Following the death of the elder Killiaen, the property was managed by a succession of family members. About 1712, a grandson of the old patroon, Hendrick Van Rensselaer, inherited the Crailo, and put up the substantial brick house we refer to as Fort Crailo. This old portion of the house is the portion facing Riverside Avenue today. A later addition was made to the house c. 1762-68, by John Van Rensselaer, Hendrick's son.

The two sections of the house tell more about the social history of the periods of the house than anything else. The interior of the older portion of the house has been restored and re-restored at different times. What remains clear however, is the difference between the 1712 portion with its fortress-like construction, unmistakeably defensive in character, and the 1762-68 portion, more open, spacious, and one might say, confident, in a less troubled historical period.

The bitter competition between the French and the English for the ascendancy in North America struck terror into the hearts of agrarian settlers, because each of those nations enlisted the help of Indians to carry on the most conspicuous bruitality. The savages helped both sides to destroy the homes of 10,000 families in the Hudson and Modhawk Valley during the 18th century, not to mention the raping, murder and pillaging that went with it. The 20 inch thick brick walls of Fort Carailo are a reflection of the need for a defensive, fortress-like dwelling. So too are the gunports added probably shortly afterwards.

Fort Crailo is a 2 1/2 story brick house with gable roof, broad to Riverside Avenue, dating from about 1712. The ell at the rear of the house is perpendicular to the older section and dates from c. 1768.

The earlier portion of the house consists of two rooms on each floor, connected

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The historic house we call "Fort Crailo", is a fine example of an 18th century Hudson Valley house built in a Dutch style, reflecting the background of its builders.

The Dutch occupied the upper Hudson Valley for trade with the Indians shortly after Henry Hudson's famous 1609 voyage on the Half Moon. After 1629, the Dutch used a system of land tenure called Patroonship, whereby Dutch merchants were required to encourage the settlement of their large land holdings. One of these families was that of the Van Rensselaers, who ultimately built, about 1712, and then expanded, about 1768, this house. The building remains to us then as both an unusual architectural example, and an important artifact of this regional socio-political system of patroonship.

by a hall where the stair is placed. "Loopholes" in the basement may be evidence of the need at any moment to defend the building with rifle-fire, during the earliest period. Expansion of the building to a third floor, and the addition of an ell at the rear is thought to have taken place about 1768. Brickwork is of a mixed bonding and quality throughout the house, with diapering evident in some of the larger blank walls, and mouse-toothing at the eaves. The heavy mullions of the casement windows in the older section, as well as their heavy, batten shutters, are in direct contrast to the obviously lighter and more secure six over six, thin-mullioned, late-Georgian sash windows.

Gabled dormers pierce the metal roof of the new section, while the older sections tile roof, features only its two end chimneys. The two gables are perpendicular to each other. Entrances are in the west side of the older section, and in the north and south sides of the ell.

A well at the rear of the house has traditionally been identified as the site of the writing of the Revolutionary War song, Yankee Doodle, purportedly penned by a British officer quartered at Fort Crailo, as he observed the raggedy appearance of the rebellious amateur soldiers of the colonial armies.

Fort Crailo is operated today as a historic site by the State of New York, regularly open to the public, and explain by a trained historian.

across an open space of lawn about 50 feet wide between the river and Riverside Avenue, the east side of the house faces another string of houses facing the next most easterly city street, at a distance of approximately 100 feet.

The boundary of this National Historic Landmark then consists of only the lot upon which the building stands, bounded on the west by the east curb of Riverside Avenue, and on the east by the rear lot line of the property, about 100 feet behind the house. The north and south lines of the lot lie within a few feet of the house on either side, where privately-owned dwellings are standing.

Total acreage of the site is approximately one-half.
