DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Justin Smith Morrill Homestead stands on the lower portion of some 3 acres of sloping land located on the east side of Morrill Highway just south of the village common of Strafford, Vermont. The property to the south and west of the Homestead is occupied by private residences; that to the north is the site of Strafford's Morrill Memorial Library. The front edge of the Morrill property is marked by vertical flush-board fencing set between granite posts. A small stream flows along the northern edge of the site.

Designed by Morrill himself and constructed in 1848-51, the house is a very personal interpretation of the Gothic Revival style. Set on a low brick foundation, the 1 1/2-story building has exterior walls of horizontal flush-boarding and a steep gabled roof of slate; the plan is irregular with a projecting front bay and rear ell. Lathe and bandsaw cut-out decorations line the gable ends of the main portion of the house. Carved finials rise from the gable peaks and from the two dormers on the forward roof slope. At a later date, Morrill added a library on the southeast side of the house and extended the dining room and added a porch on the front; both additions carry crenelated parapets.

Gothic detailing appears throughout the interior of the house with the exception of the main parlor which is Greek Revival in character; all door and window trim is of hand-carved mahogany. On the right (southeast) of the 21-foot deep center hall are the parlor, music room, a bedroom, and the library; on the left are a dining room, breakfast room, and kitchen. The second floor contains four bedrooms in the main portion of the house and three servants' rooms in the ell. The contents of the house are largely original, ranging from oak and mahogany furniture of the mid-19th century to linens and kitchen implements.

Some rehabilitation of the Morrill Homestead has been necessary but this has consisted primarily of repainting and repapering the interior, repair of the roof, and replacement of deteriorated sections of the exterior trim. The small wooden barn or carriage shed which stands immediately east of the house is also in good condition. Further away to the north are a large horse barn and several wooden sheds, all in need of some repair. Beyond these is the farm pond. Traces of a circular carriage drive remain in the lawn in front of the house; other original landscape features have disappeared but could be restored since a plan of the grounds as laid out by Morrill exists in the University of Vermont Library.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Justin Smith Morrill of Strafford, Vermont was the man immediately responsible for the two most important actions taken by the federal government in the field of higher education in the whole of the 19th century. As a member of the House of Representatives (1854-1866) and of the United States Senate (1866-1898), Morrill introduced and directed the final passage of the Morrill Acts of 1862 and 1890, which provided for the establishment and federal support of America's land-grant colleges.

The 1 1/2-story wooden Gothic Revival house which Morrill designed for himself and constructed in 1848-51 stands just south of the village common at Strafford. Although Morrill spent most of his time in Washington during his Congressional career, he retained the Vermont house until his death in 1898. The Morrill Homestead became the property of the State of Vermont, Division of Historic Sites, in 1969. The house remains relatively unaltered and its contents, including furniture, books, and personal memorabilia, are largely original. Maintained as a museum house, the Morrill Homestead is open to the public daily from Memorial Day through mid-October.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Justin Smith Morrill was born at Strafford, Vermont, on April 14, 1810. He attended the village school and neighboring academies until the age of fifteen, when he became a clerk in the village store. Morrill moved to Portland, Maine, in 1828 to learn merchandizing. He returned to Strafford in 1831 and began to operate the village store in partnership with his friend Jedediah H. Harris. The business prospered and by 1848 Morrill was able to retire to a quiet life of reading and farming. In that year he began construction of the Morrill Homestead, which he had designed in a very personal interpretation of the Gothic Revival style; the house was completed in time for his marriage to Ruth Barrell Swan on September 17, 1851. The couple had two sons.

As an amateur politician, Morrill had served on various county and state committees and in 1852 he was selected to represent the Whigs at their national convention. In 1854 Morrill was elected as an Anti-Slavery Whig to the House of Representatives and the next year played a prominent role in the organization of the Republican Party in Vermont. He held his seat in the House until 1866 when he was elected to the United States Senate, where he served for nearly thirty-two years. In the House Morrill became OK a key member of the committee on Ways and Means and was its chairman from 1865 to 1867; in the Senate he served effectively as a member of the committee of finance, of which he was chairman from 1877 to 1879, 1881 to 1893, and 1895 to 1898. As chairman of the Senate committee on buildings and grounds, he was largely responsible for the plan and execution of the terraces, fountains and gardens of the Capitol, the completion of the Washington Monument, and the construction of the Library of Congress building.

Though Morrill's primary interest lay in problems of tariff and finance, his greatest accomplishment was the passage of the legislation which created a system of state educational institutions aided by the federal government. In 1857 he introduced in the House a bill "donating public lands (30,000 acres for each Representative and Senator in Congress under the apportionment of 1860) to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts". This was vetoed by Buchanan in 1859, but similar legislation-- the Land-Grant College Act or the Morrill Act--was signed by Lincoln in 1862. In 1890 Morrill introduced in the Senate the Second Morrill Act which set the precedent for federal aid to education by providing that $25,000 be given annually by the government to each land-grant college.

Morrill was a skillful legislator, noted for his sound reasoning, his clear apprehension and statement, and his temperate attitude. In his later years in the Senate, his prestige was great and he was often referred to as "the Nestor of the Senate", "the grand old man of the Republican Party", and "the Gladstone of America". Morrill died at his Washington home on December 28, 1898.

Though Morrill spent most of his time in Washington during his Congressional career, he returned regularly to his house in Strafford for vacations. On Morrill's death the house was inherited by his son John, who maintained it until his own death in 1910. Another branch of the Morrill family then took over the property, selling the house and furnishings during World War II to a religious organization which planned to use it as the headquarters for a boys' boarding school. However, the organization changed its plans and within a few months sold the house to Miss Elizabeth Sullivan of Hanover, New Hampshire. Recognizing the historical significance of the house, Miss Sullivan made no changes in it. The Justin Smith Morrill Foundation was incorporated in 1961 and maintained the Homestead from that time until 1969 when it was donated to the State of Vermont.

The Morrill Homestead remains relatively unaltered and in good condition. The contents of the house, including furniture, books, and personal memorabilia, are largely Morrill pieces. In addition, a large collection of Morrill papers and related documents is maintained at Strafford's Morrill Memorial Library,
