DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The suburban commuter community of Riverside, as planned and developed by Olmsted and Vaux in 1869-71, was comprised of 1,600 acres. About 700 acres of this total were set aside for parks, roads, and walks. called for the construction of 40 miles of carriage roads, from 15 to 50 feet in width, and 80 miles of walks. Most house lots were 100 feet wide and 200 feet deep. Residences were set back at least 30 feet from the front of the lot and each dwelling built had to cost at least $3,000. Development of the town began in the southwest portion - adjacent to the tracks of the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad - in 1869. Superintendent of Construction for the development was L. Y. Schermerhorn. By 1871 nine and one-half miles of carriage roads had been completed and two more miles graded. Seven miles of asphalt-covered walks and 16 miles of storm drains and sewers had been built. Gas and water pipes had also been installed. A gas works and water works had been erected and 200 gas street lights set out. Fortyseven thousand shrubs, 7,000 evergreens, 32,000 deciduous, and 2,500 large shade trees had been planted.

As to structures, a red-brick and stone 2 1/2-story block of stores and offices (still standing), a stone chapel capable of seating 300 people, a large frame hotel in the Swiss chalet style (now gone), and about 50 frame residences - mostly designed in the Gothic Revival style - had been erected by 1871. The architects of these first buildings were Calvert Vaux, Frederick C. Withers of New York (1828-1901) (who designed the business block and church), and John C. Cochrane (1835-1875), a Chicago architect.

The Panic of 1872 and resulting depression threw the Riverside Development Association into serious financial difficulty and the community thereafter grew much more gradually. Many additional residences have been added over the years, utilizing Olmsted's original overall plan for the town. A number of other important architects have worked in Riverside since 1871. There are still extant a number of houses by William L. B. Jenney (1832-1907), Chicago architect and a resident of Riverside; three by Frank Lloyd Wright (1867-1959), including his Avery Coonley House of 1908; two dwellings by Louis Sullivan (1856-1924), and one (1912) by Gruenzel and Drummond.

Only minor changes have been made in Olmsted's original plan in the 1,500-acre portion of Riverside that is included in the historic district. What was once a park (the area marked x on the attached maps) was changed to a landscaped residential area in the 19th century and a few of the large house lots have recently been subdivided to permit the construction of adjacent dwellings. About five of residences built 1869-71 are still standing, and the later dwellings richly illustrate the many and changing architectural styles used in the period 1871 to 1969. Gas street lamps are still utilized in all residential sections of Riverside. There are no intrusions. The historic district is now closely hemmed on all sides by typically unplanned and unsightly urban sprawl and Riverside's planned open spaces and greenery make a particularly dramatic contrast with the surrounding communities.

Approximately 100 acres of the original tract (that area now bounded by Forbes Road on the east, by Salt Creek on the south and west, and by Logan Avenue on the north) has been excluded from the historic district.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

Designed in 1868-69 by the master landscape architect Frederick Law Olmsted, Sr. (1822-1903), and the noted architect Calvert Vaux (1824-1895). Riverside is the prototype of the comprehensively planned and landscaped suburban commuter community in which the natural features have been preserved and added to in order to offer the benefits of rural life. Here, for the first time and in a classic example, landscape design was applied to a suburban development to utilize the topography and natural features for the purpose of enhancing the quality of community living. A quality environment was created by the establishment of a park-like atmosphere, the planned openness of the town site, and by the use of gracefully curved and sunken roads adapted to the topography and natural features of the land. Except for very minor changes, Riverside has preserved its original landscaped plan almost intact.

Olmsted's Ideas and Plan

Just prior to the Civil War large American cities began to develop their first commuter suburbs. Fast railroad service enabled wealthier families to leave the central sections of cities and live in mansions set in a rural surrounding. Believing that "the mere proximity of dwellings which characterize all strictly urban neighborhoods is a prolific source of morbid conditions of the body and mind, manifesting themselves in "nervous feebleness...and various functional derangements, Olmsted saw the wellplanned suburb, in contrast to the central city, as the place where one could find "the most attractive, the most refined, and the most soundly wholesome forms of domestic life, and the best application of the arts of civilization to which mankind has yet attained." In 1869 Olmsted set out to create for the Riverside Development Association a new community that would illustrate his ideas. With his partner, Calvert Vaux, he used careful planning to make the proposed Chicago suburb a place to foster the harmonious cooperation of men in a community and the intimate relationship and constant intercourse and interdependence between families."

Given practically free rein by the trustees of the organization chartered to develop the Riverside suburb, Olmsted and Vaux found themselves with a f 1600-acre site admirably suited to the type of bedroom community being developed in the post-Civil War period. Located on a site six miles west of  $oldsymbol{t}$ hicago, Riverside had both the efficient railroad link with the central city and attractive topography which sloped gently toward the Des Plaines River. Prior to 1868, American suburban planners and developers invariably followed

There have been many changes and intrusions made in the section north of Forest Avenue, which is largely occupied by the Chicago Zoological Park and two schools. The Olmsted plan was never utilized in the portion south of Forest Avenue. Instead, another developer substituted a travesty of the Olmsted plan: Tiny public "parks", small house lots, and "curved" roads. In this section these "features" are jammed together in a small area for the purpose of utilizing every last square inch of land.

the practice of imposing a rectangular grid system of streets and lots on whatever topography existed. Natural features such as hills or streams were regarded as an inconvenience to be corrected or ignored. In his plan for Riverside Olmsted established the foundation for an entirely different line of suburban design. Instead of imposing the rigid grid system, the streets were allowed to flow around the landscape and topography in harmony with the meandering Des Plaines River and land along the river was preserved for general use in the form of public parks or commons.

His approach, as outlined in his firm's preliminary report of 1868 to the trustees of the Riverside Development Association, became a classic guide for later developers of suburbs. The primary objectives of the trustees, Olmsted wrote, should be the development of a general plan, the fault of most existing suburbs being that "no intelligent design has been pursued to secure ...distinctly rural attractiveness." In the execution of the Riverside plan Olmsted reinforced the existing natural beauty by planting roadside trees in irregular clusters to give a spontaneous effect and to exploit the beauty of massed foliage. To avoid the problem of ugly architecture, he suggested that "we can require that no house can be built within a certain number of feet of the highway, and we can insist that each householder shall maintain one or two living trees between his house and the highway line." Both of these suggestions were adopted by the trustees.

In further efforts to create a rural atmosphere, Olmsted and Vaux stressed in their report the importance of unfenced parks and recreation grounds with the "character of informal village greens." Various such parks were to be scattered throughout the development, often with facilities for "croquet or ball grounds" or other "objects of general interest." The spacious front yards of the residences were to be unfenced and a further damming of the Des Plaines River was suggested to provide facilities for pleasure boating.

In designing their transportation network, Olmsted and Vaux again introduced a new concept. Interior roadways wound around interesting natural features; they focused on the river; they were often depressed to create a less disturbing effect on the open sight lines, and for the first time streets were also deliberately curved - "the idea being," in Olmsted's words; - "to suggest and imply leisure, contemplativeness, and happy tranquility." Within the development a separation of business and pleasure traffic was also suggested. Finally, one of Olmsted's most radical innovations, not actually adopted by Riverside, was for a six-mile pleasure parkway connecting the community with Chicago for the benefit of commuters who wished to ride their horses to and from work. This idea Olmsted was not able to apply in practice until his work on his Boston project-after 1878.
