DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Chamber of Commerce rises four and one half stories and is square in plan with masonry bearing walls. The principle facade is four bays wide, the first story heavily rusticated and containing two entrances--the center door leading directly into the main hall and a more elaborately carved door, projecting slightly on the west end leading into a side entrance and the club spaces above. The material is ashlar Vermont marble, which is dressed on the second and third levels. The asymmetrical facade above the ground level is divided by six giant order Roman fluted columns, two stories in height, on bases and capped by Ionic capitals. The columns were centered to frame sculpture, two in the center and paired at each end. The capitals have the usual Ionic scrolls with swags replacing the traditional acanthus leaves. The third floor is defined by four large bulls-eye windows, elaborately carved with swags above and wreaths below based on a running frieze of modified brackets. At the third story there is a full entablature carried on modillions with a row of dentils below. The copper roof is a steeply-pitched convex mansard decorated with elaborate ornament and punctured by closely-set dormers, three on each facade. The dormers also have rich hoods and side volutes.

The interior first floor contains the Great Hall which measures 60 feet by 90 feet and was patterned after the Guild Halls of London. The wall are hung with 284 portraits of prominent Americans. Included are works by Copley, Trumbull, Stuart, Vanderlyn, the Peale family, Durand and Johnson.

On the second level are a series of meeting rooms and the Commerce Club. There is a full basement below the entire building.

The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York exemplifies the solidity and power of this organization in the city and in the Nation.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The first organization in America for the promotion of trade and commerce was organized in 1768 in Fraunces Tavern and chartered by King George III in 1770. The present Chamber of Commerce building in the French Renaissance style was completed in 1902 and dedicated by President Theodore Roosevelt. This lavish marble structure housed the foremost commercial membership in America and was completed at a cost of $1,500,000. Although dwarfed today by surrounding skyscrapers, the building retains its rich marble detail on the exterior and still houses a magnificent collection of American portraits.

The history of the New York Chamber of Commerce is described as follows:

"On the 5th of April 1768, twenty New York merchants met together at the tavern kept by Bolton and Sigell (later Fraunces Tavern) (which is still on the southeast corner of Broad and Pearl Streets, and the same at which, on December 4th, 1783, WASHINGTON took farewell leave of his officers,) and organized the New York Chamber of Commerce.

In 1769, its meetings were held in a building called "The Exchange," at the lower end of Broad Street. In 1779, removal was made to "The Merchants' Coffee House," on the southeast corner of Wall and Water Streets. There it remained till 1817, when another move was made to the "Tontine Coffee House," on the northwest corner of the same streets. In 1827, a still further change took place to the Merchants' Exchange, then occupying the site of the present Custom House, where it remained till that building was destroyed by fire in 1835. It then found shelter for many years in the Directors' room of the Merchants' Bank, No. 42 Wall Street, leaving it in 1858 for rooms in the building, No. 63 William Street, and, finally, in 1884, it moved into its present quarters.

Although the migrations of the Chamber were numerous its members seemed to have enjoyed what, in the early days of its history, was considered solid comfort. It is recorded that at all meetings, and until well into the present century, the Treasurer was obliged to provide bread and cheese, beer, punch, pipes and tobacco, the expense to be paid by the members present, "but not to exceed one shilling a piece," and in order to obtain a full attendance it was decreed "that members not attending the monthly meetings were to be fined two shillings each."

In later years several efforts have been made to provide a suitable building for the Chamber, but they all failed for the reason that while as an Association, remarkable as ours has always been for educating its members into a system of princely giving towards maintaining works of philanthropy and charity, in founding universities of learning and libraries, in cultivating the arts and sciences, and all else that pertains to the elevation, refinement and happiness of a great community, it failed completely to appreciate that phase of charity which the good old proverb describes as "beginning at home."¹

Subscribers to the permanent building fund in 1900 included J. Pierpont Morgan, John D. Rockefeller, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Andrew Carnegie, the Guggenheims and William C. Whitney, they raised $1,500,000.

Of the founding of the Chamber of Commerce itself, the minute books state:

"Founded in the eighth year of the Reign of King GEORGE the Third, while New York was still a British Colony, the history of the Chamber bridges over the long period between the first manifestations of the spirit of American Independence and the development of the United States into one of the greatest of commercial and industrial powers. The most remarkable of all the conquests of the Republic has been its conquest of foreign markets, and the Chamber has always stood as the exponent of the most intelligent opinion and progressive policy of the merchants of the great emporium of the foreign trade of the country...the patriotic spirit of the society's founders was disclosed unmistakably at their first meeting. They chose for their President John Cruger, the man who had drawn up in 1765, in the Stamp Act Congress of the Colonies assembled in New York City, the famous 'Declaration of Rights and Grievances of the Colonies in American,' which was sent to the British Parliament. When in the same year the stamps arrived and the Royalist Governor had declared his purpose to enforce the act, there was a popular uprising against their reception, during which an effigy of the Governor was burned in Bowling Green.

.....the members of the Chamber were in full sympathy with the patriotic views of their President was shown a year later, when he was re-elected. He was at the same time speaker of the last Colonial General Assembly ever gathered in the colony, and in the minutes of the session of the Chamber on May 2, 1769, it is recorded that 'Mr. President reported that he had it in charge to give the merchants of this city and colony the thanks of the House for their repeated, disinterested, public-spirited and patriotic conduct in declining the importation of goods from Great Britain until such Acts of Parliament as the General Assembly had declared unconstitutional and subversive of the rights and liberties of the people of this colony should be repealed.'

It was inevitable that the activities of a society founded at such a time, and by such men, though nominally for 'promoting and encouraging commerce,' should be extended to a field with far wider boundaries than the words imply. From the very beginning the Chamber took its place as an influence in national affairs whenever there appeared in those affairs issues affecting the national welfare and honor, and the successors of the founders have adhered to that interpretation of its functions down to the present day, not only in national but in state and municipal affairs as well. It is a noble tradition and nobly has it been maintained."²

The New York Chamber of Commerce was powerful far beyond the boundaries of New York City--they represented the commercial, financial and industrial history of the Nation.

The architect of the new building was James Barnes Baker (1854-1918). The structure has a mansard roof and columned facade that once framed three monumental sculptures of famous New York statesmen. An elaborate over-entrance carving symbolizing Commerce (two reclining figures represent Mercury and Ceres framing an elaborate escutcheon) are by Karl Bitter. The other three sculptures represented Dewitt Clinton by Daniel Chester French and Alexander Hamilton and John Jay by Philip Martiny. The two decorative groups by Martiny were particularly well suited to the decorative French-Renaissance facade. In 1926, the sculpture was removed and placed in storage because the marble had begun to weather badly.
