Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The unifying theme of this nomination is the design of all structures included in it by members of the Boise-based architectural firm of John E. Tourtellotte and Company (after 1910 called Tourtellotte and Hummel). The history and importance of this firm are discussed at length in Section 8. In summary, the firm is the single most important in Idaho architecture; its forty-five-year commissions list encompasses many of the state's major architectural and institutional monuments--preeminently, its capitol building--and a full representation of the appropriate periods of developmental style. This Thematic Group consists of those Idaho properties that could be located, are not presently registered, and were judged to be individually eligible for the National Register. Properties included in the group are drawn from a list of commissions that is as complete as possible. The method of compilation is described later in this section. A copy of the complete commissions list, coded for status and condition, is attached as an appendix to section 8 and is thus available as a basis for future re-evaluation.

The 139 sites in this group are limited to the state of Idaho, although the Boise office did design some buildings (some of which still stand) in nearby areas of neighboring states. Sixteen of Idaho's forty-four counties are represented. The map of distribution of these properties shows a concentration of sites in Boise and those immediate environs that are now incorporated within its city limits. Smaller concentrations occur in other major Boise Valley towns such as Nampa and Caldwell, with projects cropping up as well in small towns such as Emmett, Meridian, and Payette and further from the capital in Glens Ferry and Mountain Home, to the east on the Snake River Plain. A scatter of commissions extended the firm's influence to the eastern edge of the state, very near the Montana border, and well up into Idaho's northern panhandle. This extension took place generally by two means: the firm's relationship with institutional clients, such as the State of Idaho and the Catholic Church; and the opening of a short-lived branch office in Lewiston. These means will be discussed further in Section 8 and in the individual site inventory forms.

The most frequently represented functional type among the 139 sites of the Thematic Group is the private residence. Sixty-one buildings designed for this purpose are included. The preponderance of dwellings reflects and emphasizes--perhaps overemphasizes--the early importance of domestic architecture in the work of the firm. There are two major reasons for the large number of houses. First, only buildings not previously listed in the National Register are included. Many of the firm's commercial and institutional buildings are in downtown districts that were early subjects for historic-district designation. The cities of Boise, Lewiston, Twin Falls, and Caldwell all contain established or proposed historic districts including Tourtellotte and Company or Tourtellotte and Hummel projects, and those structures do not appear in the Thematic Group.

The non-residential sites represent a variety of functional types. They include twenty-six commercial buildings, eight apartment buildings, seven buildings for educational purposes, six for fraternal organizations, and four structures best described as monuments. There is among the 139 sites a very great range of material: brick, stone, and cast-stone masonry; frame; masonry veneer; reinforced poured concrete. The nomination includes buildings as large as a warehouse with 35,520 square feet of floor space and as small as a two-room country schoolhouse with 1,480 square feet.

There is an equally broad range of styles. In general, the sites from the turn of the century to the early 1920s demonstrate a movement from the eclecticism of the late 1890s and turn of the century (see supplemental photographs 1 and 2) to a protracted academic, often classicizing, phase. The beginning of this phase corresponds to the winning of the State Capitol commission in 1905 (supplemental photograph 4) and was reflected in commissions of all functional types: institutions, commercial buildings, and large houses (supplemental photographs 3 through 7). A similar spirit, austere in comparison with the late-nineteenth-century eclectic buildings, but relatively informal in expression, animates the less pretentious residential styles of this period--the shingled colonial style and Bungalow houses of 1900 through 1920. The institutional buildings influenced by the Second Renaissance Revival, which survive in some numbers from the 1910s, are long, low, hip-roofed buildings, often classically detailed, which are suggestive of these two modes. The picturesque tendencies of the 1920s are exemplified in two previously registered buildings, the Egyptian Theatre and the Alexander's building in Boise (supplemental photographs 8 and 9), and are equally evident in more modest buildings of the Thematic Group, particularly in the resurgence of the Mission style and other late-1920s and early-1930s picturesque modes. Finally, in the later 1930s, clear expressions of the progressive art deco style appeared, often in federally financed institutional buildings and frequently with either a strong picturesque or a strong classical tone. The successive stylistic phases follow the sequence of styles generally in vogue during this forty-five-year period. They also reflect the particular stylistic preferences of the architects who were the dominant design influence in the firm at various times: the eclecticism of John Tourtellotte; the classicism of Charles Hummel; Frederick Hummel's fondness for the picturesque; and Frank Hummel's taste for the "modernistic."

The survey for this nomination proceeded in two stages. The first was a compilation and cross-indexing of all currently available sources on the firm to produce a comprehensive list of commissions undertaken by the principals of the firm before its name was changed to Hummel, Hummel and Jones, Architects, after World War II. The second included a field search for and documentation of the buildings represented in the commissions list and an evaluation of the eligibility of the previously unregistered structures in Idaho.

Sources for the commissions list were references in early Idaho newspapers, many of which have been indexed for architecture; other secondary sources; and primary materials in the office of the successor firm, Hummel Jones Miller Hunsucker P.A. The newspaper references to the firm's history were especially important in documenting the outlines, at least, of two important phases that would otherwise not be represented. The first of these includes the very early work of John Tourtellotte and Charles Hummel in independent practice and the pre-1905 practice of Tourtellotte and Company. Very few drawings, and no collateral materials such as collections books, are available for this period. The other phase that is known to us entirely through newspaper references is the production of the Lewiston office of Tourtellotte and Company, which operated from 1906 through 1910 under the management of Ralph Loring. No records of this office survive in Boise, and their existence elsewhere has not been established.

For the Boise office from 1905 to the early 1940s, there are not only large numbers of architectural drawings, tracings, and prints but also extensive supporting documentation in the form of collections books (very nearly comprehensive throughout the period), contractors' certificates, correspondence, a retrospective summary file prepared by Frederick Hummel in the 1930s, and miscellaneous materials such as intermittently kept business diaries and, for the late 1930s, lists of volume of work by year. With the exception of the correspondence, which in the interests of time was consulted only to clarify otherwise ambiguous references, all of these materials were examined, indexed, and collated with the newspaper references and with information from sources such as city directories and Boise City building permits in the collections of the Idaho State Historical Society in Boise.

The resulting list of over 900 commissions from 1896 through 1941 is not complete. There are certain to be oversights in the areas known only from newspaper reports. Even for the post-1905 Boise work, a number of references had to be listed as incomplete because they could not be dated, located geographically, or otherwise fitted into the list. It is likely that at least some of these references apply to known sites in unknown ways. In any case, the resulting list may properly be considered as comprehensive as currently possible for the production of the Boise office after 1905. It is improbable that any major projects from this period have been missed by the combination of approaches employed.

The commissions list includes large numbers of minor projects, such as remodelings, that have been identified as well. While such projects have not been considered for the Thematic Group unless they represent substantial revisions of space or style, their inclusion in the full list contributes to a realistic profile of a working architectural firm.

The compilation effort was followed by a field search for previously unidentified properties. Where original drawings were available the search was facilitated by thumbnail sketches made of the principal elevations and carried into the field. Both phases of the survey effort were conducted during 1979-1980 by Patricia Wright and Lisa B. Reitzes, architectural historians with the Idaho State Historic Preservation Office.

The resources grouped in this nomination were chosen on the basis of individual eligibility for the National Register on architectural grounds. While individual buildings were selected in the context of their local settings, and no effort was made to include examples of every building type and style represented in the full commissions list, an illustrative profile of the firm's career does emerge in the 139 sites represented here. Rarer building types were assessed more generously than common ones. For example, a greater degree of alteration was considered tolerable in the only turretted commercial building to be included in the group because extant examples of such structures by any firm are rare in Idaho. Residential structures, which survive in far greater numbers, were required to be intact in order to be included.

Most categories of buildings produced by the firm are represented in one way or another in the Thematic Group. Exceptions occur where, as in the case of an interesting group of early institutional buildings (see supplemental photograph 2), the entire category is lost; or, in the case of the large-scale commercial buildings undertaken in the first decade of the century, most examples have already been entered in the National Register (see supplementary photograph 6). A clear cross-section of style, however, is represented. Individual significance statements discuss the relationship of each site to the group as a whole and to other Tourtellotte and Hummel buildings that were not considered eligible or are already entered on the National Register.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The unifying significance of the nominated resources, in addition to the architectural distinction of the individual buildings, is that all were designed by members of the firm of John E. Tourtellotte and Company (after 1910 called Tourtellotte and Hummel), and that this firm is the single most important in Idaho's architectural history. Principals of the firm were responsible for a number of the state's major architectural landmarks: in the first decade of the century, the neo-classical Revival style State Capitol, the Romanesque Revival St. John's Cathedral in Boise, and the academic late Gothic Revival Administration Building at the University of Idaho in Moscow; and later, in the 1920s, the Renaissance Revival Alexander's store, the Egyptian Revival style Egyptian Theatre, and the art deco Hotel Boise, all in the capital city. (See supplemental photographs 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, and 10.) All of these buildings have been previously listed in the National Register, as have a number of other individual buildings as well as buildings in historic districts; they establish both the quality and the stylistic and temporal range of these architects' work. However, the extensive body of work produced by the firm over its forty-five-year history has not previously been identified and considered as a whole. Consequently, the eligibility of hundreds more properties designed by the firm has not previously been evaluated. The present Thematic Group and the survey upon which it is based reveal the range and sequence of developmental style and the extensive geographic and temporal distribution represented by this firm's work. Taken as a whole, the group provides not only an overview of much of Idaho's architectural history but also a profile of a working architectural firm--far more coherently than a scatter of isolated monuments could. Moreover, these thematically grouped resources, considered in context and in chronological order, illuminate such issues as changes in lifestyle and cultural values: for example, the movement from the relative formality of the Victorian house plan to the open informality of the bungalow and then to the quite radically changed spaces of the 1920s and 1930s cottages. They bring into focus interesting patterns of patronage and architectural business practice, such as the cultivation of institutional and individual clients who offered lucrative repeat business--institutions like the State of Idaho and major religious denominations and individuals like Boise realtor Walter E. Pierce, whose acquaintance meant to these architects the design of at least a score of buildings in addition to two of his own homes. These and related issues of substantial interest to Idaho's architectural and social history are discussed in more detail in the significance statements for the individual properties.

John Everett Tourtellotte (1869-1939) was a Connecticut native, apprenticed as a contractor in Massachusetts, who moved west in 1889 and arrived in Idaho in 1890. Charles Frederick Hummel (1857-1939) was born in Baden, Germany, and educated as an architect at a technical college in Stuttgart. He immigrated to America in 1885 and arrived in Boise in 1895. These men worked independently as contractors and architects in Boise, and in Hummel's case also in the nearby town of Weiser, through the remainder of the 1890s. In 1900 they entered into business together under the firm name of John E. Tourtellotte and Company. Their rapidly growing firm expanded to include a branch office in Lewiston, Idaho, during the years 1906-1910. This branch was discontinued after manager Ralph Loring left to establish an independent practice; but in 1913 John Tourtellotte himself undertook to form a branch in Portland, Oregon, of what had since 1910 been known as Tourtellotte and Hummel. Tourtellotte practiced in Portland for the rest of his life, except for a brief return to Boise around 1920. After 1922 the two offices were independent, although both retained the firm name and they periodically worked together.

The careers of the second generation of the Tourtellotte and Hummel firm, Frederick Charles Hummel (1884-1978) and Frank Konrad Hummel (1892-1961), overlapped those of the first. These sons of Charles F. Hummel, both educated as architects at the University of Pennsylvania, joined the firm in 1909 and 1916 respectively. When John Tourtellotte and Charles F. Hummel dissolved their partnership in 1922, Frederick Hummel remained in Boise in practice with his father. Frank Hummel practiced with Tourtellotte in Portland until 1935, when his older brother took a leave of absence to work with the Federal Housing Administration and Frank returned to Boise. After the deaths of both Charles Hummel and John Tourtellotte in 1939, the Hummel sons carried out a last few projects under the firm name of Tourtellotte and Hummel before the United States' involvement in World War II. In July of 1945 a new partnership was formed and the office was reopened under the firm name Hummel, Hummel, and Jones, Architects. The present successor to this firm, Hummel Jones Miller Hunsucker P.A., still operates in Boise, with Charles Hummel's grandson and namesake as the senior associate. This remarkable continuity, and the sensitivity to historical materials shown by the successor firms in maintaining a well-ordered archive through a number of moves, have made the present survey possible.

The primary significance of the properties included in this Thematic Group is architectural. That is, they are important, first and foremost, as individually significant specimens of their styles and types, the range of which was outlined in Section 7, and as illustrative parts of the total production of a firm of outstanding importance in Idaho. They are contributions to our understanding of that firm's functioning, growth, and change--and by extension, to our comprehension of the evolving architectural history of the state during the period 1895-1941.

The resources nominated here form a finite group and comprise all examples that are known to be extant, have not been previously nominated, and can presently be evaluated as individually eligible. The selection of sites has been made on the basis of a comprehensive survey of the entire body of work produced by the firm during a clearly defined period, from the time the founding partners came to Idaho to the year the last projects signed Tourtellotte and Hummel were initiated. It was in the interest of establishing a finite and coherent group that the cut-off was set at the relatively late date. An early-1930s cut-off date, observing the fifty-year guideline, would have been based on nothing other than the guideline; it would have produced a group that was not finite but would expand until 1991. A cut-off date of 1939, the year the original partners died, was considered but discarded as equally arbitrary; these resources represent the corporate production of the firm, not the individual output of the senior partners. Since the focus of the nomination was on the firm, rather than upon particular personalities, and since a natural break in the firm's history did occur in 1941, the decision was made to use this break to include the work of the firm up to the point, quite soon after the deaths of John Tourtellotte and Charles Hummel, when the war interrupted the firm's production for several years and after which it was re-formed under a new name.

The only properties that might logically belong in a group so defined and have been excluded from it are those numerous sites already nominated to or already listed in the National Register. For purposes of comparison and understanding, however, these properties are included in the commissions list, along with all other commissions (not extant, ineligible, or not located) for the period. Photographs of the most important of them are included with the main nomination form as supplementary photographs 1 through 10.

The nomination contains a number of properties with characteristics that require specific justification if they are to be considered eligible for inclusion in the National Register. The largest number of these exceptional properties are less than fifty years of age. The reasons for defining the Group in such a way that it included properties less than fifty years old are discussed above. Since the nomination deals with the production of a corporate practice over time, all commissions up to the point when the firm decisively changed were integrally related and divisible only by arbitrary means. The desirability of the present definition was strengthened by the presence, in the 1930s, of a large number of works of considerable interest and distinction. These works relate to architectural modes like art deco and its institutional permutations encouraged by the federal response to the Depression, and the late revivalist modes. These styles have been recognized in the National Register in other contexts, and it is possible to evaluate them in an historical perspective despite their slightly shorter remove in time. However, great care was taken with the selection of the non-age-eligible sites. Only those that are particularly distinguished and particularly significant to a demonstration of the firm's work in the 1930s were chosen. Only those that can be justified as exceptionally important, at least in the local context (such as the relatively rare examples of commercial art deco in Boise), were chosen. Great selectivity was used in including examples of numbers of institutional buildings of the later 1930s. With the passage of time, and as these resources become more rare, more may be added to the Thematic Group. Some resources do exist that may prove to be important but for which no evaluative framework exists at present: for example, the early proto-ranch-style house designed for himself by Frank Hummel in 1938. This and similar houses may also be objects of future evaluation. The commissions list is intended to facilitate such reconsideration. The status of properties evaluated as exceptionally important in the present group is discussed in more detail in the individual inventory forms.

Three properties have been moved from their original sites: the 1897 Pierce-Borah House (site 1); the 1900 Episcopal Bishop's house (site 2); and the 1928 Elk River (now Bovill) Catholic Church (site 116). The inclusion of all three buildings is justified on the basis of their architectural significance in state or local architectural history. The first two buildings are considered to be stellar and by now relatively rare examples of the equally rare Queen Anne style houses with which John Touretellotte made his reputation. They are of historical significance for the people who commissioned and/or lived in them--Boise entrepreneur Walter Pierce and Senator William E. Borah, in the Pierce-Borah House, and Episcopal Bishop James Funsten, in the Bishop's House. The Elk River Catholic Church is of architectural significance on two levels: it illustrates a later adaptation of a church type these architects used repeatedly in the 1910s, and its history is tangible evidence, in the very circumstance and timing of its move, of the impact of economic depression on company towns. After nearly a half-century in its location in nearby Bovill, the church has also acquired additional significance as the most architecturally distinguished church building in that small town, which inherited it from the nearly defunct town of Elk River after losing its own church to fire.

Two properties in the Thematic Group, the Kinney and Green mausoleums (sites 36 and 55), are grave sites. These structures are included here on the basis of their architectural interest. The mausoleums indicate the stylistic direction of the firm and of local taste during their construction: classicism that occasionally tended toward romantic eclecticism.

Finally, a substantial number of properties included herein are owned or used by religious institutions. Like the mausoleums, all of these buildings are nominated and justified on architectural and architecturally historical grounds: for their individual architectural distinction, and for their contribution to the pattern of stylistic change and of patronage that is established by the group as a whole.

The results of this survey and nomination will be made available for use in state and local planning by means of processes of notification to county and municipal officials and through the Idaho State Historic Preservation Office's urban planning and tax act consultant and public information officer.
