DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Avon Comgregational Church presents an ormate and delicate facade to the street. Its three-bay portice is slightly set of from the facade proper and is defined by flush boarding and four fluted Tonic pilasters. Between the pilasters are three twenty over twenty pane windows, with a row of dentils at the headings, at the second floor, and three entryways with arched familichts and keystone arches above. Here, as on the rest of the church, is a wide frieze and modiflions on raking and return cornices. Above the triangular pediment rises a bell tower, sheathed with clapboards, in the front of which is a round motif resembling a globe. The first stage of the tower, above a balustrade and urns, is octagonal with burvred openings with keystone arches above. At the next stage pilasters finish the corners and another motif fills in the flat sides. There are urns and modiflions at each stage. The spire gracefully tapers to a peak, upon which is a weathervane.

To the rear of the church proper is a one and a half story wing, probably housing offices and classrooms. It is harmonious, though does not have the grand dotail of the main portion.

The foundation of the main structure is dressed red sandstone blocks.

The Avon Congregational Church is one of several churches in the State built by David Hoadley, a native Connecticut architect, born in Materbury in 1774. Mr. William Warren of Litchfield has called it "one of the finest examples of a Connecticut architect's designs." It shows the influence of Charles Bulfirch, who, with his Boston churches, moved the previously traditional side entrance to the end, where the entire gable end became the dominant feature and readily was given to decorative details.

It was the second church built in the town, the first having been built on the east side of the Farmington River in 1754 when the area was the Northington Society in Farmington. After it burned in 1817 and the western part of the town settled, the parish was divided and a church built in West Avon. The new society was called Avon in 1819 and that year funds were raised to build a meetinghouse which furnishes an excellent example of the architecture of the period.¹

The church has not always had an easy existence. The bell was reputedly cracked in 1865 while celebrating Lee's surrender at Appomattox. In 1876 there was a bad fire, and the hurricane of 1938 blew the top of the steeple off; it was subsequently restored.

The church is a striking building, but its beauty is threatened by oncroaching commercial buildings. The other corner sites of the large junction of two busy highways are occupied by ar automobile agency, a gas station, and a modern low brick building housing a bar and grill and drup store, none of which is an appropriate or compatible land use so close to such a fine building as the Congregational Church.
