The Camden Meeting House is a simple, gambrel-roofed structure erected on brick footings. The north gable end serves as the frontage and contains a central entry. The north facade is laid in Flemish bond brick coursing, broken by two windows flanking the entry, two windows on the second level in the gable, and a semicircular attic light containing the date marker.

The east and west side walls are laid in common bond of various courses. Two windows, symmetrically placed, break each side facade, and two shed -roofed dormers correspondingly punctuate the roof. Below the roof line along the east and west facades is a box cornice with simple moulding details.

The rear, or south, facade matches the north with two exceptions: the brick coursing, common bond here being used, and the semicircular attic light, now absent.

The interior remains unbroken except by a raised platform along the south wall, and an enclosed entry vestibule and stair, to the north. A drop-leaf interior window provides communication between the vestibule and meeting room.

Above the meeting room is located a school room, illuminated by the dormer windows and gable-end windows. Some of the old desks and equipment still remain from before 1882, when use of the school room was discontinued. Above the school room is located an attic loft filling the remainder of the gambrel.

Laid out in 1783 by Daniel Mifflin, a member of the Society of Friends the town of Camden has been a center for a considerable Quaker population since that time. In 1800, Camden Meeting was established, the last in Southern Delaware. Twenty-five members of the Society of Friends in the Camden area signed a petition and appointed three trustees to erect a building for worship and education. In 1805 the present Camden Meeting House was erected on land deeded by Jonathan and Patience Hunn in 1806. Unlike most meeting houses, the Camden Meeting was built with a gambrel roof and a north gable-end frontage.

In 1828 the Motherkill Monthly Meeting joined the Duck Creek Meeting; the joint meeting became known as the Camden Monthly Meeting in 1830. Meetings were held alternately at Camden Meeting House and Little Creek Meeting House until the latter was suspended in 1865. Since that time, Camden Meeting has remained the only active meeting in lower Delaware. At present, the Camden Monthly Meeting is under the jurisdiction of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Adjoining the meeting house is a graveyard, with stones dating to 1837, which is notable for its unusually tall grave markers. The school, located above the meeting room, was active from 1805 until its suspension in 1882.
