The house was built of brick, roughcast with stucco scored to simulate stone, and originally painted a warm, rosy beige. The original finish has since been cemented over; the cement is also scored, and present ly is painted cream color. The building's ornament is quite plain. A broad, flat, masonry belt course marks the division between the two stories. Similar flat bands frame the windows, the belt course forming the lower part of the frame of the second story windows. There is a gap of about a foot between the window-sill and the belt course, giving the effect of a recessed panel. The windows of the lower floor are treated in similar fashion, although the bottom course is not continuous. Although there is some variation in window size and type, most of the windows of the lower floor are casement, with a two-light transom, and two lights in each lower section. The second floor windows are double-hung, four-over -four sash. There is an arched window on the stair landing, and a triple row of arched windows on each side of the third floor of the tower.

Although this was a country house and evidently always rather simple, the exterior trim was once far richer. The house faces the Delaware River to the south. This south front has a projecting square bay as an entrance; originally there was a typical Italianate balcony over the door. A roofed cast iron veranda reached towards the west from this entrance bay; it continued around the projecting semi-hexagonal bay at the southwest corner of the house. The north front was originally the main entrance to the house. It still retains a broad, arched doorway, framed with a band of masonry. Originally there was a substantial wooden portecochere, pierced on three sides by arches like that of the entrance door. All the windows were provided with "exterior Venetian blinds", that is louvered wooded shutters with thin, movable slats. All this exterior trim was removed in the course of a WPA project in 1935-6.

The house is roofed with metal. The rooflines are rather flattish, as is usual in the Italianate style. Originally the roofline was given added variety by the arrangement of clustered chimnies. These have since been reduced in height and encased in concrete.

The interior plan is most clearly revealed in the basement, where the structure is supported on a series of brick vaults and arches. There were five principal rooms, plus a hall, on each floor. The stair rose in the tower, while the servants' rooms and kitchen were relegated to a lower two-story wing to the east. On the first floor the partitions between four of the principal rooms have been removed. Plywood ceilings

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Mansion House in Cadwalader Park is a prime example of an increasingly rare, although once important, Victorian domestic building type, the Italianate villa. It is, now that Riverside at Burlington has been demolished, probably the earliest surviving example in New Jersey designed by the architect who introduced the Italianate villa to America, John Notman. Although it has lost a good deal of superficial ornament, its basic forms have not been tampered with. It retains the ample proportions, free plan, and generous interior spaces that characterize Notman's work.

Furthermore, it retains the major portion of the landscape which was an integral part of Notman's planning for such suburban or country villas.

The house was built in 1845 or 1846 for Henry McCall, a wealthy Philadelphian with business interests in Trenton, mainly as a summer home. At the time, Notman was working in Trenton as architect for an enlargement of the New Jersey State House, and on several projects in Princeton. His own pride in the house is shown in his use of it as a demonstration site when he was called on to design a house for John and Sarah Stockton of Princeton. The house was sold to the Park Commission of the City of Trenton in 1898.
