Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Richland Center City Auditorium is constructed of concrete and red brick, is rectangular in shape and dimensioned 77 feet long by 122 feet wide. It is three stories tall, flat roofed and relatively devoid of ornamentation, although there are some classical features: ionic decorations at the top of the entrance pilasters and dentils under the front facade molding.

The interior of the building contains offices throughout the front portions of the second and third floors with a large meeting room also on the third floor. Most of the rest of the building is given over to the auditorium. The auditorium consists of a sloping main floor and a cantilevered balcony, providing a total seating capacity for over 900 people. The stage, at the rear of the building, is a simple 20 x 30 foot opening in the rear wall, and has about 800 square feet of floor space. Twelve dressing rooms are behind the stage. Gold trim is used to decorate the stage proscenium, and there are some gold bas relief decorations on the side walls. In 1967, the City Auditorium was renovated with fresh paint; a new sound and lighting system was installed in the auditorium, but no alterations were made in the form of the building.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Richland Center City Auditorium is significant as an inovation in local government and civic activity. It was necessary for the city of Richland Center to effect a change of state law, which had theretofore prohibited a city from operating an income producing auditorium. Since its completion in 1912, the auditorium has been the governmental and social nexus of the city, contributing a large role to its history.

Social. In its first twelve months of operation, the City Auditorium held 51 public meetings and entertainments, from which the city took in a $2000 profit.⁴ Profit, however, took a back seat to the social and educational offerings presented at the auditorium over the years. Virtually every common form of entertainment has been presented on the auditorium stage: plays, concerts, Lyceum lectures, recitals and even minstrel shows. When the city had extensive train service, the auditorium shows drew hundreds of rural, as well as city, folks.⁵ Until the growth of movie houses, the auditorium also showed films. Recently, increased use of other mediums for entertainment has led to a decline in performances at the auditorium. There are still a few concerts and recitals, however. When, in addition to the auditorium, the Center's meeting rooms and banquet facilities for various clubs are considered, it is little surprise that a visitor to Richland Center referred to the building as having "undoubtedly contributed...to the community spirit and democracy of the place."⁶

Government. Offices for the various city officials, including the mayor, city clerk and the common council have been located in the City Auditorium since it opened in 1913. Also, the auditorium itself has given these officials a convenient place for maintaining good ties to the citizens. During the Depression, for example, area farmers met there to discuss New Deal agricultural measures, from which emerged specific requests and complaints to Federal administrators.⁷ Lectures at the auditorium have included political topics, and these have been delivered in the past by numerous elected representatives, and more famous speakers, including William Jennings Bryan and William Howard Taft. Naturally, the auditorium has been used many times for public meetings on civic issues.⁸ After 67 years of service, the City Auditorium remains the focal point of Richland City government.
