Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Vaught house was erected in 1900 on the corner of Ward Avenue and Fifth Street. It is a frame structure of late Victorian massing and detail. Its irregular plan and outline are further varied by the partial second story which increases the complexity of the roofline. The main roof is hipped and supports a population of gables of various sizes and shapes facing each direction, while the hipped roof of the upper bedroom is topped by a cluster of four gablets, which provide visual interest as well as ventilation. Originally there were five chimneys with corbeled tops, but only one still stands, minus its tip. A large, curved, one-story porch extends around the southwest corner from the parlor ell to the dining room bay. This porch originally had slender turned posts supporting the flat roof, and it was decorated with a frieze of spindles and brackets and a balustrade of spindlework rectangles. This Eastlake ornament has been replaced by slightly tapered columns beneath a solid frieze of vertical boards, while the railing now has closely spaced rectangular balusters--probably an early alteration intended to update the house to the Colonial Revival style. The dining room bay has a double hung window in each side wall and a horizontal window of frosted and etched glass in the center. The other windows are of varying sizes but are double hung with a single pane in each sash and have plain frames with modest cornices. The foundation of brick piers has been filled in solid. The front door is multi-paneled and glazed and has a rectangular transom above. An identical door directly above it admits to a small balcony from the upstairs bedroom. This balcony is wood shingled along the bottom in a scalloped pattern, while turned corner posts support a pedimented gabled roof. Spindlework, arranged to create a circular opening on each side of this balcony, has disappeared. Decorative work of the jigsaw variety enlivens the front pediments and gable peaks. A porch across the rear has been enclosed.

The front entrance opens directly into the west parlor, which connects with both the east parlor and with the dining room on the north. Access to the long center hall originally was from either of the parlors; however, the doorway from the east one has now been plastered over. Off the hall on the east side are two baths and two bedrooms, while the west side contains the dining room and kitchen. The second floor is composed of a large stairhall, one bedroom and a bath. Although minor alterations have been made on the interior, the turn-of-the-century appearance is intact. The coal burning fireplaces have wooden mantels of varying designs; the most impressive is in the west parlor and has tall Ionic columns supporting an overmantel frieze above a mirror and a bowed and bracketed shelf. Polychromed ceramic tiles of a wreath and ribbon design surround the opening. The dining room mantel is composed of colonettes on tall pedestals, a simple shelf, plain frieze, and surround of floral patterned tiles. The bedroom mantels each have pilasters of molded trim, end and base blocks, a simple shelf, and a curvilinear frieze. A pocket door separates the two parlors as well as the west parlor and dining room; these are multi-paneled while the other doors are four paneled. There are several styles of trim, but all are symmetrically molded with bull's eye corner blocks and base blocks. Most doorways have transoms, and crown molding encircles the three main rooms. The stairway has a half-turn with landing, rectangular balusters rising from the closed string, and a simplified Eastlake newel. The wood floors are original.

The house has just been renovated for use as an art gallery and frame shop. The only structural change made at this time was the conversion of a back window to a door.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Vaught house is a well maintained example of late Victorian domestic architecture in Huntsville. It also functions as a concrete reminder of the days when East Huntsville Addition was Huntsville's first modern suburb--a fashionable neighborhood removed from the downtown and made practical by the construction of the street car line. It is one of the few Victorian style houses and one of the few large scale houses which remains in this area of town.

In 1890 construction began on Huntsville's first large-scale manufacturing operation-a cotton textile mill located beside the railroad tracks north of town and outside the then city limits. The land east and south of the mill was platted as the East Huntsville Addition (1892) with the major streets being a continuation of the existing city street system. The land immediately adjoining the mill was developed as mill housing for the operatives, while the remainder became Huntsville's first modern suburb and began to fill with private homes for the people who were attracted to the town by the prosperity of the mill.

Development was slow at first but picked up after 1900, when a street car line was completed through the suburb connecting it with downtown Huntsville. As a result, the majority of homes in East Huntsville were erected during the first thirty years of this century; and consequently, they are predominantly variations of the bungalow. The Vaught house, built in 1900, was one of the earliest of these privately constructed homes as is evident by its strong Victorian character. Although this appears to be a late date for Victorian building, it was the period 1900-1910 that saw the transition from 19th to 20th century architectural styles in Huntsville. During this decade, one could erect a Victorian cottage, a Colonial Rivival house, a bungalow, or some combination thereof.

The Vaught house is representative of Victorian residential design in Huntsville, displaying such characteristics as asymmetrical massing with a strong vertical emphasis, irregular, complex roof, jigsaw ornament on gables and pediments, and variety in fenestration and window design. On the interior, the house retains its original finish of multiple firplaces with accompanying variations in mantel design, pocket doors, hardware, staircase with Victorian newel, floors, and variety of window and door trim.

The house remained a single family residence until 1974 when it was converted to commercial use--a reflection of the changing character of the neighborhood. Fifth Street, which ran beside it, has become, in the last twenty years, a major commercial thoroughfare, now renamed Andrew Jackson Way. Fortunately, however, the house has since been used as a decorator's shop and now as an art gallery and frame shop, uses that took advantage of its distinctive architectural identity to create an attractive shop image. During the most recent restoration just completed, the house was beautifully repaired and repainted, with the only structural alteration being the conversion of a rear window to a doorway. The colors chosen for both interior and exterior were taken from the ceramic tiles surrounding the fireplace openings.
