Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Hopkins House is set on hilly terrain near the center of the town of Marion. Despite the in-town setting, the house is secluded from other buildings by several hundred feet of trees. The property is approached by means of a nearly axial gravel road which is lined with cedars. The front yard is encompassed by an old picket fence.

The Hopkins House is of the so-called "Carolina I" type. It is unusual in that it has a pair of small cabinet rooms set at the ends of both the front and rear galleries. Other examples have cabinets only at the rear. The floor plan is dominated by the 13 foot wide central hall, which is entered through an 8 foot set of folding paneled doors with a continuous 8 1/2 foot transom.

Certain features appear to have been milled elsewhere and brought to the site. These include the elaborate Federal mantel in the parlor, the moldings used in the other mantels, and the Greek Revival double panel doors. Other features such as the door jambs, the staircase, the majority of the mantels, and the panels below the chair rail in the parlor and upstairs bedroom, are crude and simple and appear to have been made locally. Much of the woodwork (doors, mantels, and paneling below the chair rail) has faux bois treatment. In all cases the panel surrounds are grained to resemble walnut while the panels themselves are grained to resemble maple.

To the rear is a c. 1910 kitchen and dining room wing. The old rear gallery was glazed in c. 1950. The present roof of the house dates from c. 1910. An additional change is the loss of four of the original six chimneys, although the mantels remain.

Assessment of Integrity:

Despite these changes, the Hopkins House retains the essential characteristics of a Carolina I house. These vital characteristics include: (1) a plan which consists of essentially two rooms placed side by side or with a hall between; (2) a basic form which is two stories high surmounted by an end-gabled roof; (3) a one story gallery across the front; and (4) a one story shed across the rear.

SUMMARY PARAGRAPH:

The Hopkins House (c.1850) is a frame Carolina I house with an unusually wide central hall. It is located in the small north Louisiana community of Marion. Despite a few alterations, the house retains its National Register eligibility.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph) Criterion C

The Hopkins House is significant at the state level in the area of architecture as an example of the "Carolina I" house type. These houses are significant as indicators of the migration of the planter and upper middle classes from the region of South Carolina. Dr. Fred Kniffen states in his article on Folk Housing: "Early in its movement southward the "I" house became symbolic of economic attainment by agriculturists and remained so associated throughout the Upland South and its peripheral extensions." Elias George, the builder of Hopkins House, originally came from South Carolina before settling in Alabama. Most of the other known extant "Carolina I" houses in Louisiana are in the Feliciana Parishes. The SHPO is currently aware of less than ten "Carolina I" houses that remain in Louisiana. It stands, therefore as an unusual and important example of a substrain of the British vernacular architectural tradition in Louisiana.

History of the Property:

The builder of the Hopkins House, the Reverend Elias George, moved to the Marion area in 1848 from Alabama. He and his family moved into their new home, built by an artisan slave named John Thomas, in 1850. In 1866 Elias George sold his home to his daughter Susan and her husband Lewis M. Powell. In 1884 the Powells sold the property to J. W. Frellsen. The Frellsen and Powell families intermarried and the house was eventually occupied by Miss Mary Hopkins, who remained there until her death in 1975 at the age of 84. It is presently owned by Mrs. Alice Frellsen Farrar.
