NATIONAL REGISTER

This form is for use in nominating or requesting determinations of eligibility for individual properties or districts. See instructions in Guidelines for Completing National Register Forms (National Register Bulletin 16). Complete each item by marking "x" in the appropriate box or by entering the requested information. If an item does not apply to the property being documented, enter "N/A" for "not applicable." For functions, styles, materials, and areas of significance, enter only the categories and subcategories listed in the instructions. For additional space use continuation sheets (Form 10-900a). Type all entries.

Pomfret Town House (Photographs 1 and 2) is a one-story gable-roofed building erected in 1841 to accommodate Pomfret's town meetings. It is of post-and-beam construction, with the exterior covered with clapboards. The long side of the building, which is approximately 40' x 24' in plan, faces a circular driveway off Town House Drive, itself a short loop off Route U.S. 44. The small open lot is defined by fieldstone walls, with the Town House only a few feet away from the wall at the rear of the property. The symmetrical facade (southeast elevation) has two entries and five windows, with the entries located one bay in from the ends. Each entry has a large door of six raised panels, three over three, and a fluted surround with plain blocks in the upper corners (Photograph 3). The right door has a modern latch, but the left one retains its original wrought-iron latch. Each entry has a large stone step. Window openings have plain board surrounds and retain their original 12-over-12 double-hung sash, which have spring catches to hold them open. There is a partial return to the cornice, which is made up of simple cyma moldings. Side elevations have three windows each, and the rear elevation (Photograph 2) has five windows. Small brick exterior chimneys at the south and north corners are additions, probably made in 1928 when the building was remodeled. The building has no cellar and rests on a fieldstone foundation.

The interior of the Town House (Photograph 4) is entirely open and reflects the 1928 remodeling in its narrow-board hardwood floor (concealing the original wide boards) and lamp globes hanging from the plaster vaulted ceiling. Original woodwork includes simple board window surrounds and post casings. In the middle bay of the northeast wall is a raised platform about 1' high. Along the rear wall, a projection about 8" wide extends out from the wall just below the level of the window sills; the face of the projection is plastered, as are the other interior walls. The board top suggests it may have served for additional seating.

Outside, near the rear of the building on the northeast side, is a small privy (Photograph 6) which, to judge from its beaded-board siding, dates from the early 20th century; however, the two seats appear to be older.

The Town House is presently used for meetings by the Pomfret Historical Society, which acquired it in 1979.

Summary

Pomfret Town House is significant in local history as the town's first public building for government purposes (Criterion A). Built in 1841, it accommodated the town meeting, a central institution of Connecticut local government, for many decades. Even after town meetings were moved to another location, the Town House continued to serve as a polling place and facility for meetings of various town boards. A well-preserved structure which retains most of its original form and materials intact, the Town House is a local landmark and symbol of the community's identity.

Pomfret's town house also is significant on the state level as one of a small number of surviving early town halls (or town houses, as they were originally known). There are similar structures from the 1840s in Mansfield and Stafford, and an 1870 town house in Plainfield, but most of these structures, such as Killingly's c.1845 town house, are apparently no longer in existence.<sup>1</sup> These buildings are all of a type: simple, utilitarian structures with only the entrances enhanced by the architectural style then prevalent. Two entrances were common in these town houses, just as they were for the religious meetinghouses and schools of the period. (There is a tradition that close votes in Connecticut town meetings were resolved by having the townspeople walk through one of two doorways.) Town houses such as Pomfret's are important artifacts of the time when the direct democracy of the town meeting played a large role in local government. As a well-preserved example which embodies the distinctive characteristics of the early town house as a building type, Pomfret Town House has architectural significance as well (Criterion C).

Historical Context

The construction of town houses in this period directly reflects growing complexity in many Connecticut towns, as early industrialization and commercial growth resulted in diverging interests in geographically separate parts. The old practice of holding town meetings in the Congregational church survived the disestablishment of religion in 1818; in fact, public funds were still used to build Congregational churches in order to provide space for town meetings. Many towns, however, rotated town meetings among the churches in town (if there were more than one) or used various taverns, schoolhouses, and mills in order to give each section of town its due. While rotating the place of meeting avoided favoring one section over another, it often resulted in chaotic decision-making, as locally packed meetings passed resolutions which were then overturned when the next meeting was held in a different part of town. The solution adopted by many towns was to construct a building specifically for town meetings, usually after extended and acrimonious debate, at a centrally located or at least temporarily neutral site.

The origin of the Pomfret Town House was typical. In the early 19th century, Pomfret was primarily an agricultural town with important crossroad centers at Abington and Pomfret Center and manufacturing villages at Pomfret Landing and Pomfret Factory (later part of the town of Putnam). Building a town house was discussed (and rejected) as early as 1831. In 1840, the town house again became an issue, but there were too many diverse opinions as to where it should be located. Finally, the town appointed a committee of three outsiders -- one each from the adjoining towns of Hampton, Thompson, and Killingly -- to pick the spot. The present site was chosen, clearly because it lies between, yet apart from, the town's then-important population centers. The Town House was finished in 1841.

The heat of the controversy over the site of the town house in Pomfret and similar conflicts in other towns indicate the central importance of the town meeting in local government. Participants<sup>2</sup> at the town meeting, held at least twice a year and more often as needed, voted to build bridges and highways, approved local tax rates, named men to fill offices from fence-viewer to state representative, and arranged for the town's care of the poor. Pomfret Town House provided the simple, open space appropriate for a frugal town's public deliberations. There was little need to provide office space or record storage in a town house such as Pomfret's, since the selectmen, town clerk, and minor officers typically conducted the town's day-to-day business in their homes.

The privy, while apparently not as early as the main building, was present during the Town House's period of significance. Its function is clearly related to the Town House's role as a place for town meetings and undoubtedly contributed to an attentive debate of public issues which might otherwise have required premature termination.

Pomfret Town House's historical significance is augmented by its well-preserved condition. With its simple form, original small-pane windows, old doors, clapboard siding, plaster walls, and simple interior woodwork, it has retained intact its historical appearance.
