Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Cudabac-Gantt House, located adjacent to the Main Street business district of Moss Point, Mississippi, is situated in the center of a half acre lot and is surrounded with formal plantings of camellias. The grounds also contain oak, cedar, magnolia, pines and various shrubs which line the property boundaries.

Built circa 1875, the house was remodeled in 1907 in the popular Neo-Classical Revival style. Documentation is not available at this time to establish the appearance of the house before the 1907 alterations. However, the house appears to have originally been constructed in the vernacular Italianate style, having such Italianate features as a rectangular box shape, hipped roof with wide eaves supported by jigsaw brackets, a bay window, picturesque corbelled chimneys, and the rear porch's chamfered square posts.

The Cudabac-Gantt House retains a high degree of integrity from its 1907 remodeling. The two-story, Neo-Classical Revival house is faced with lapped wood siding and rests on a brick pier foundation. Three brick chimneys with corbelled caps project through the hipped roof, which is trimmed with a full entablature and bracketed cornice. Although the building forms an "L" in plan, its front (west) elevation presents a symmetrical, formal view. A full-height, central portico dominates the main facade and features four colossal Ionic columns resting on two rusticated block bases, which enclose the steps to the front porch. Behind the Ionic columns runs a one-story, full-width, wrap-around porch with tiled deck and Doric columns resting on concrete pedestals and supporting a dentilled cornice and second-floor balcony. This balcony is edged by a perimeter balustrade having plain rails and chamfered balusters and newel posts. To the south, the wrap-around porch forms a porte-cochere. On each level of the five-bay wide main facade is a central, single-leaf entrance containing a six-panel door framed by single-light sidelights and transom and trimmed with plain surrounds. Windows on this facade are one-over-one, double-hung sash.

The east facade also has a wrap-around porch featuring a wooden deck, chamfered box columns on concrete pedestals, and a balcony enclosed by a balustrade having chamfered newel posts and balusters. There are two minor entrances to the building on this elevation, one being the rear entry to the entrance foyer and the other being to the kitchen.

The north elevation possesses the least amount of detailing, with only a large projecting bay on the ground floor which houses one end of the dining room. The wrap-around porch of the west facade terminates at this bay.

Entry to the house is gained through a central foyer/stair hall with a bedroom and bath to the south and living room, dining room and kitchen to the north. At the top of the stairway is another foyer which opens to balconies on the west and bedrooms to the north and south. At the northeast corner of the foyer is a hallway with access to two other bedrooms and another bath.

The interior of the house possesses elaborately trimmed transomed doors and window openings. The open-string, two-run stairway has a molded handrail, turned balusters, and panelled newel posts with molded caps. The hall and stairway are highlighted by panelled wainscoting. Of note are two eight foot by six foot panelled pocket doors separating the foyer and living room and living room and dining room. Openings are framed by symmetrically moulded trim with bull's-eye corner blocks. Plinth blocks support the vertical door trim and also serve to end the one inch by ten inch base detail. The house has no crown mould but does have museum mould approximately eighteen inches below the ten foot ceiling height. Mantles throughout the house are of the Colonial Revival style, some having Ionic columns and mirrored overmantles.

Historic photographs show that in 1907 the house also had balustrades on the lower level of the porch and around the perimeter of the roof, but by 1920 these had been removed. It also appears that in 1907 the Doric columns and the newel posts on the northwest and southwest corners of the porch were paired, but in the 1920 photograph they were not. (Photographs of the 1907 and 1920 views were not available, but photocopies are being submitted to document the house's historic appearance.)

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Cudabac-Gantt House derives its significance from its architectural character (Criterion C), being one of only three known surviving examples of Neo-Classical Revival residential architecture in Jackson County. The other two examples are the O'Keefe House in Ocean Springs, which is a high-style example that is in a National Register district, and the Captain Clinton House in Pascagoula, which is a simpler example than the O'Keefe and Cudabac-Gantt houses. In addition, the Cudabac-Gantt House is significant because it was converted in 1907 from the Italianate style to the Neo-Classical Revival mode, illustrating the dramatic change of taste from the picturesque back to the classical and representing the prosperity resulting from the timber industry in the early twentieth century.

Built circa 1875 by Hiram M. Cudabac, the house appears to have originally been constructed in the vernacular Italianate style. Although no photographs or written documentation that would establish the original appearance of the house have been located--and early Sanborn Insurance Maps do not include this portion of Main Street--it is apparent that the original design of the house was in the vernacular Italianate style, having such features as a rectangular box shape; hipped roof with wide eaves supported by brackets; long, narrow window openings; a bay window; picturesque corbelled chimneys; and chamfered square posts, which are located on the rear porch. The Cudabac-Gantt House, however, does not derive its architectural significance from its original design but from its 1907 remodeling, which transformed the house into a fine local example of Neo-Classical Revival architecture. This alteration is significant for two reasons: (1) it is evidence of the changing tastes of the period from the picturesque back to the classical, and (2) it represents the prosperity in Moss Point and Jackson County in the early twentieth century that resulted from the timber industry. The house retains a high degree of integrity from its 1907 remodeling.

The entry portico with giant order Ionic columns and the secondary wrap-around porch with Doric columns, a dentilled cornice and balustraded balcony combine to create a good local example of Neo-Classical Revival architecture. The interior has such significant features as the open-string, two-run stairway with turned balusters, panelled wainscoting, panelled pocket doors, highly detailed trim moldings, transomed doorways, original hardware, and Colonial Revival mantles and mirrored overmantles.

In 1880, Hiram M. Cudabac sold the house to Mr. E. K. Gantt, who was responsible for the 1907 remodeling. Mr. Hosea A. Falls bought the house in 1930, and in 1940 sold it to Mr. W. H. Nelson. The house is vacant at the present time.
