Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Davenport Crematorium is located southwest of that city's downtown and is situated adjacent to Fairmount Cemetery and a residential area. F.G. Claussen, a prominent local architect, designed this l_2^1 story Romanesque structure in 1889, and it was erected the following year. The edifice's red brick walls rest on rubble-squared stone blocks over a partially raised full basement. Window and door openings are set in a combination of rectangular and arched surrounds. Windows are generally of the one-over-one wood sash variety, and most feature stained glass. The building is capped with a hipped cross gable roof covered with asbestos shingles.

Exterior ornamentation is provided by the large semicircular arched entranceway, featuring stained glass sidelights and transom and leaded glass door; carved stone lintels and bands; stone trimmed gables with arched window openings; and decorative brick corbelling along the roofline. Except for a small addition to the west side in 1979 for a second crematory retort, the building has undergone little exterior alteration.

Inside, the structure contains a large chapel, waiting room, and another small room on the first floor and an incineration room and holding chamber in the basement. Originally, the chapel was finished in natural wood, but in recent years it has been redecorated in soft tones and features rose patterned carpeting on the floor and a glass chandelier. In the center of the chapel is a catafalque with a deep purple cover that utilizes an elevator to descend slowly and noiselessly into the basement. For incineration the crematorium was equipped with Davis equipment. Originally, coke or hard coal was used, and each cremation required three quarters of a ton of coal and an hour-and-a-half. In recent years, however, the crematorium has converted to natural gas, and the time involved has been greatly shortened. Except for the redecoration of the chapel and the placement of a door in the west wall to allow entry to the 1979 addition, the interior has undergone little change.

8. Significance

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Davenport Crematorium not only has the distinction of being the first crematorium in the state of Iowa but the thirteenth established in the United States. Today, it is the ninth oldest establishment of its type still in existence. The first efforts to establish a crematorium in Davenport occurred in 1880, only four years after the first crematory was founded in the United States. Little came out of these early discussions, however, and it was not until 1885 that a cremation society was established. Organized as the Northwestern Cremation Society (later changed to Davenport Cremation Society), the group began to issue stock and look for a proper site. In 1889 the society commissioned F.G. Claussen to design a proper building, and the following year they purchased land overlooking the Mississippi River from the West Davenport Cemetary Company. The building was completed in 1890, and the first cremation took place on Mary 15, 1891.

In addition to serving Davenport residents, it served the rest of the state and areas as far away as Chicago, Minneapolis, Omaha, and Denver as well. By the end of 1900, it had handled 133 cremations. Now known as Fairmount Crematorium, the facility to date has handled well over 6,000 cremations.
