Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Central Gardens Historic District is composed of some 83 blocks, or approximately 511 acres, in midtown Memphis. Of the approximately 1540 structures within the district, the great majority are single family residences, although the area also contains multifamily dwelling units, commercial establishments, churches, and schools. The district is significant for its community planning, its architecture, its important civic institutions, and for the prominent local citizens who have lived in the area.

The northern boundary of the historic district is formed by the south edge of the commercial strip fronting on Union Avenue. It is bounded on the west by the Annesdale Park Historic District, on the south by the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis Railroad, and on the east by Rembert Street. (See site plan for exact boundaries.)

The predominant hierarchy of vehicular circulation paths is composed of four levels: major arterial routes, residential feeders, service alleys, and north-south connectors. The major arterial routes, consisting of Union Avenue, Peabody Avenue and Central Avenue, channel traffic around and through the district in an east-west direction. In earlier days both Peabody Avenue and Central Avenue included trolley lines along a central median, connecting Central Gardens with the downtown area to the west. Parallel to these arteries are the smaller residential feeders, such as Linden, Vance, Carr and Harbert. Many of these streets are separated by the narrow service alleys which are used for garbage collection and access to electric power lines. Tying together this network of east-west streets are north-south connectors, such as Melrose, Willett, Belvedere Boulevard and McLean Boulevard. With the exception of Belvedere Boulevard and McLean Boulevard, these north-south connectors are, for the most part, not lined with houses. Their main purpose is to facilitate vehicular movement between the east-west streets.

Many of the area's original distinctive features and details, such as the concrete gate posts at each end of Belvedere Boulevard, carriage blocks, and blue tile street markers inlaid in the concrete sidewalks, remain intact and contribute to the district's special character. While some of the original elm trees have succumbed to disease, the streets, for the most part, retain their original shady quality. The original cobblestone paving has, however, been covered with asphalt.

In general, the hierarchy of individual structures within Central Gardens reflects the hierarchy of the street network. The typical single family house occupies a lot measuring some 50 feet wide and 120 feet deep, with a setback of approximately 40 feet from the street. Along the wider streets, such as Belvedere Boulevard and Central Avenue, however, houses are larger and lots average some 100 feet wide and 200 or more feet deep. Setbacks range from 60 to 100 feet.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph) Criteria A, B, and C

The Central Gardens Historic District, located in midtown Memphis and containing over 1500 structures, exemplifies the best in urban residential community planning and architecture of the first three decades of the twentieth century. The richness and diversity of its eclectic architecture is unified into a highly coherent whole by the strong order of its hierarchical vehicular circulation system, as well as by the prevailing consistency of setbacks, massing, cornice heights, and detailing which characterize the individual buildings. As one of Memphis' most prestigious neighborhoods during the period of c.1900-c.1930, Central Gardens contains houses originally occupied by many of the city's most prominent citizens, as well as a number of the community's most significant institutions. Following a period of decline after World War II, the area has in recent years undergone a continuing revitalization and is now once more a thriving urban neighborhood which retains virtually all of its original character.

With the prosperity of Memphis' timber and cotton industries during the late nineteenth century, an increasingly wealthy upper middle class of businessmen and professionals constituted an expanding market for real estate development to the east of the downtown area. During the first decades of the twentieth century, a series of individual residential subdivisions, eventually to become known collectively as Central Gardens, were opened by developers. New residential streets, with cobblestone pavement, curbs, sidewalks, street trees, and utilities were extended from west to east, parallel to the older east-west arteries. The most intensive development occurred between c.1905 and c.1915, and by c.1925, the area had achieved most of its present density and character.

Following World War II, the area slowly declined as many of the original residents fled to the burgeoning suburbs of east Memphis. By the late 1960's, however, a gradual rediscovery of the neighborhood had begun, led by young professionals who were attracted by the spaciousness and architectural character of the houses, the shady streets, and the low property costs. In 1967 a new neighborhood association was formed and as one of its first actions selected the new name "Central Gardens" to identify the area. This name was suggested by the neighborhood's relationship to Central Avenue and its resemblance to New Orleans' Garden District. The Central Gardens Area Association which soon became one of the strongest and most active in the city, commissioned its own Neighborhood Improvement Plan in 1975, resulting in successful rezoning of Central Gardens to preserve its largely single family residential character.

Central Gardens today is once more a thriving urban neighborhood with Most lots, regardless of size, include outbuildings originally containing servants' quarters and a garage. Often these outbuildings reflect the architectural style of the main house. In many cases they afford access to the service alleys which were originally used for deliveries.

In architectural style, Central Gardens is highly eclectic, reflecting the variety of tastes prevailing among the prosperous upper middle class of early twentieth century Memphis. This variety, however, does not detract from an underlying coherence of the district which is derived from an allegiance to certain ordering principles such as uniform setbacks, cornice heights and massing; and the characteristic use of such details as front porches, bay windows, portes cocheres, and leaded glass. Indeed it is this combination of great richness and diversity among individual houses, all set within a highly ordered whole, which is one of Central Gardens' most distinctive and significant qualities.

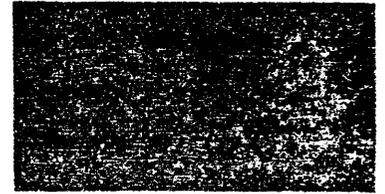

The majority of houses in Central Gardens were constructed between 1905 and 1925. The most prevalent architectural styles found in the district are the Four Square and the Bungalow. Other recognizable styles which occur frequently include Queen Anne, Greek Revival, Georgian Revival, Jacobethan Revival, Shingle Style, and Italian Villa Style. A significant number of houses, however, refuse to fit neatly into any single stylistic niche, exhibiting an eclectic freedom which often incorporates disparate stylistic elements with surprising success.

The Central Gardens Historic District also includes a number of individual landmarks of extraordinary significance, some of which are listed on the National Register. These include Beverly Hall, ("Greenwood") (715), the E. H. Crump House (1064), the Matthews House (Robert M. Carrier House) (613), the First Congregational Church of Memphis (30-31), and the Rozelle-Holliday House (873), which is currently pending. Other individual structures worthy of special note include Grace-St. Luke's Episcopal Church (819-322), The Cathedral of Immaculate Conception (792-798), Kimbrough Towers Apartments(41), and Miss Lee's School of Childhood(1025).

Listed below is an inventory of individual structures within the district. In general, dates of construction are approximate. Key numbers refer to the attached Site Plan. There are approximately 1540 buildings in the Central Gardens Historic District; of this number, 168 buildings do not contribute to the historical character of the district due to their age of less than 50 years or to their loss of their historical or architectural character through extensive alteration.

a strong sense of its own identity. Projects and activities such as annual block parties, a 4th of July parade, a garden club, and a neighborhood security patrol all testify to the vitality of the area.

The developers of the original subdivisions which together compose the Central Gardens Historic District provided many of the amenities which have since become standard in modern community planning. Paved streets with concrete curbs and sidewalks, utilities, street trees, and in some cases, street lighting, were all included as incentives to prospective lot purchasers. In addition, such enlightened practices as hierarchical lot sizes and setbacks, both related to the width of the street, characterize the area and contribute to its strong sense of spatial coherence.

The area is organized by a highly ordered vehicular circulation system consisting of a four-level hierarchy of streets, including major arterial routes, residential feeders, service alleys, and north-south connectors. A fifth level of hierarchy, the trolley lines which originally ran along the central medians of Peabody Avenue and Central Avenue, no longer exists. The hierarchy of the street system is reflected in the size and character of the buildings which relate to them. From the mansions lining Central Avenue to the servants' quarters along the alleys, the variety of scale among buildings and their corresponding open spaces reinforce this street grid hierarchy.

The proportion of total open space relative to the mass of buildings in Central Gardens foreshadows the typical suburban densities of later subdivisions. As compared to the higher urban densities which characterized downtown Memphis in the early twentieth century, the overall Central Gardens density of approximately three dwelling units per acre is quite low and suggests the appeal the new residential area must have had for those who desired to migrate to the quieter outlying fringes of the city.

Another significant aspect of the Central Gardens Historic District is the successful mixture of land uses which has long characterized the area. While the great majority of structures are single family residences, the area also contains numerous apartment buildings, several churches, schools, offices and shops. As a result the neighborhood is enriched with a diversity which contributes to the prevailing sense of urban community. Many of these structures stand out from the overall fabric of single family residences and take on the role of landmarks which aid in orientation and serve to visually accent and enrich the area.

It is important to note that, with the exception of a relatively small number of structures of unusual distinction, the architecture of Central Gardens is quite "ordinary" . Its significance lies in the fact that this "ordinary" architecture of the upper middle class was of such consistently high quality in terms of design, workmanship, and materials.

The richness and variety among the individual structures which are contained within the hierarchical fabric of Central Gardens result in a distinctive quality of ordered diversity. Architecturally, the District contains a broad spectrum of styles ranging from Queen Anne through Bungaloid. The majority of single family residences of "pure" style are either the Four Square or Bungaloid styles and were constructed between c.1905 and c.1925. Numerous other styles, including Greek Revival, Georgian Revival, Jacobethan Revival, Shingle Style and Italian Villa Style are also represented, however. As such, the area is broadly representative of the evolution of residential architecture between c.1890 and c.1930. With only a few exceptions, however, such as houses of the Greek Revival style, the architecture of the District is more "mid-American" than it is "Southern". As has been observed by architectural historian Vincent Scully, the houses of Central Gardens bear a closer resemblance to those of Oak Park, Illinois, than the nineteenth century Southern vernacular. Indeed, the area contains at least one example (1288) of the Prairie Style.

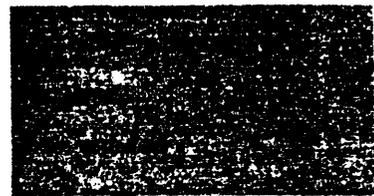

Despite the eclecticism of Central Gardens' architecture, however, there is a strong sense of compositional coherence. Even though a typical block may contain a variety of recognizable styles, as well as numerous houses which defy stylistic categorization, virtually all will tend to adhere to the same rules of massing, scale, cornice height, setback and lot size; in addition, all will typically share such features as front porches, size and number of windows, and details such as stained and leaded glass, bay windows, and portes cocheres. While materials may be mixed in various combinations of color and texture, the choice of materials is generally limited to brick, limestone, stucco, clapboard and shingles. Workmanship is of a consistently high quality, and the detailing is often surprisingly rich and well-conceived. It is this broad uniformity of concept within which is allowed considerable diversity of detail that distinguishes Central Gardens' residential architecture.

A number of buildings in Central Gardens possess extraordinary significance and are listed individually on the National Register. These include Beverly Hall ("Greenwood") (715), the E. H. Crump House (1064), the Matthews House (Robert M. Carrier House) (613), the Rozelle-Holliday House (873), which is currently undergoing review, and the First Congregational Church of Memphis (30-31).

Several other buildings also deserve special mention for their architectural and/or historical significance. Kimbrough Towers (41), constructed in 1939, was once the largest concrete apartment building east of the Rocky Mountains. Its Modernistic styling and prominent location on Union Avenue at Kimbrough have made Kimbrough Towers a midtown landmark.

Miss Lee's School of Childhood (1025), founded in 1924 by Miss Eva Lee, has occupied its present location on Peabody Avenue for over fifty years. Among the many elementary-aged children who attended the school was former Memphis Mayor Henry Loeb. Until her death in 1960, Miss Lee lived at the school. Grace-St. Luke's Episcopal Church (818-822) was created as the result of the merger of two pre-existing parishes, Grace and St. Luke's, in 1940. The Late Gothic Revival style St. Luke's Church (821), constructed in 1912, became the home of the new parish following the sale of the old Grace Church at Vance and Lauderdale. As a result of the merger, many of the stained glass windows, the altar, and various works of art from the old Grace Church were moved to the new location.

The Cathedral of Immaculate Conception, (792-796, 798), located on Central Avenue at Belvedere, is another major landmark within the Central Gardens Historic District. The original buildings, dating from 1922, included the Elementary School (792) which at that time was used for worship services. The main sanctuary, designed by Regan and Weller, Architects, was completed in 1938 following the start of construction in 1927. The Spanish Colonial Revival style structure, which contains a 1200 seat auditorium, was the largest Catholic Church in the city. In 1970, the church was designated by the Vatican as the cathedral of the new Memphis Diocese, under Bishop Carroll T. Dozier.

The Central Gardens Historic District has been the home of many of Memphis' most prominent and influential citizens. Perhaps the most famous was Edward Hull ("Boss") Crump, 1874-1954, whose home was at 1962 Peabody (1064). Crump was a leader in - - and eventually exercised virtual control over - - much of the Tennessee Democratic Party for over fifty years. He served as mayor of Memphis and was also a member of the U. S. Congress.

Two other former mayors of Memphis, Watkins Overton and Walter Chandler, were also Central Gardens residents. Other notable individuals included banker and land developer T. O. Vinton, Commercial Appeal editor C. P. J. Mooney, insurance executive and city censor Lloyd T. Binford, cotton merchant J. P. Norfleet, Postmaster Clinton McKellar, and Circuit Court Judge and local historian John Preston Young.

The Central Gardens Historic District is thus significant in three principal areas. In the field of community planning, the area was among the first to be developed with what were to become standard subdivision amenities and services. It also exhibits a strong hierarchy in its street grid and open spaces, and is characterized by the integration of a diversity of land uses. Secondly, the architecture of Central Gardens is highly diverse stylistically and is broadly representative of the evolution of residential architecture between c.1890 and c.1930. Despite its eclecticism, there is a strong sense of coherence which unifies the District. And thirdly, Central Gardens has numbered among its residents many of Memphis' most prominent and influential citizens who were active in politics, business, and the professions. The District also contains a number of the city's major institutions.

The District has survived intact with relatively few alterations in its original character. Its continuing vitality as a neighborhood demonstrates the validity of the early twentieth century concepts of planning and design which Central Gardens exemplifies.

These, in turn, were determined in most instances by zoning considerations.

In some cases, however, minor deviations were made in order to respond to land usage and historic conditions.

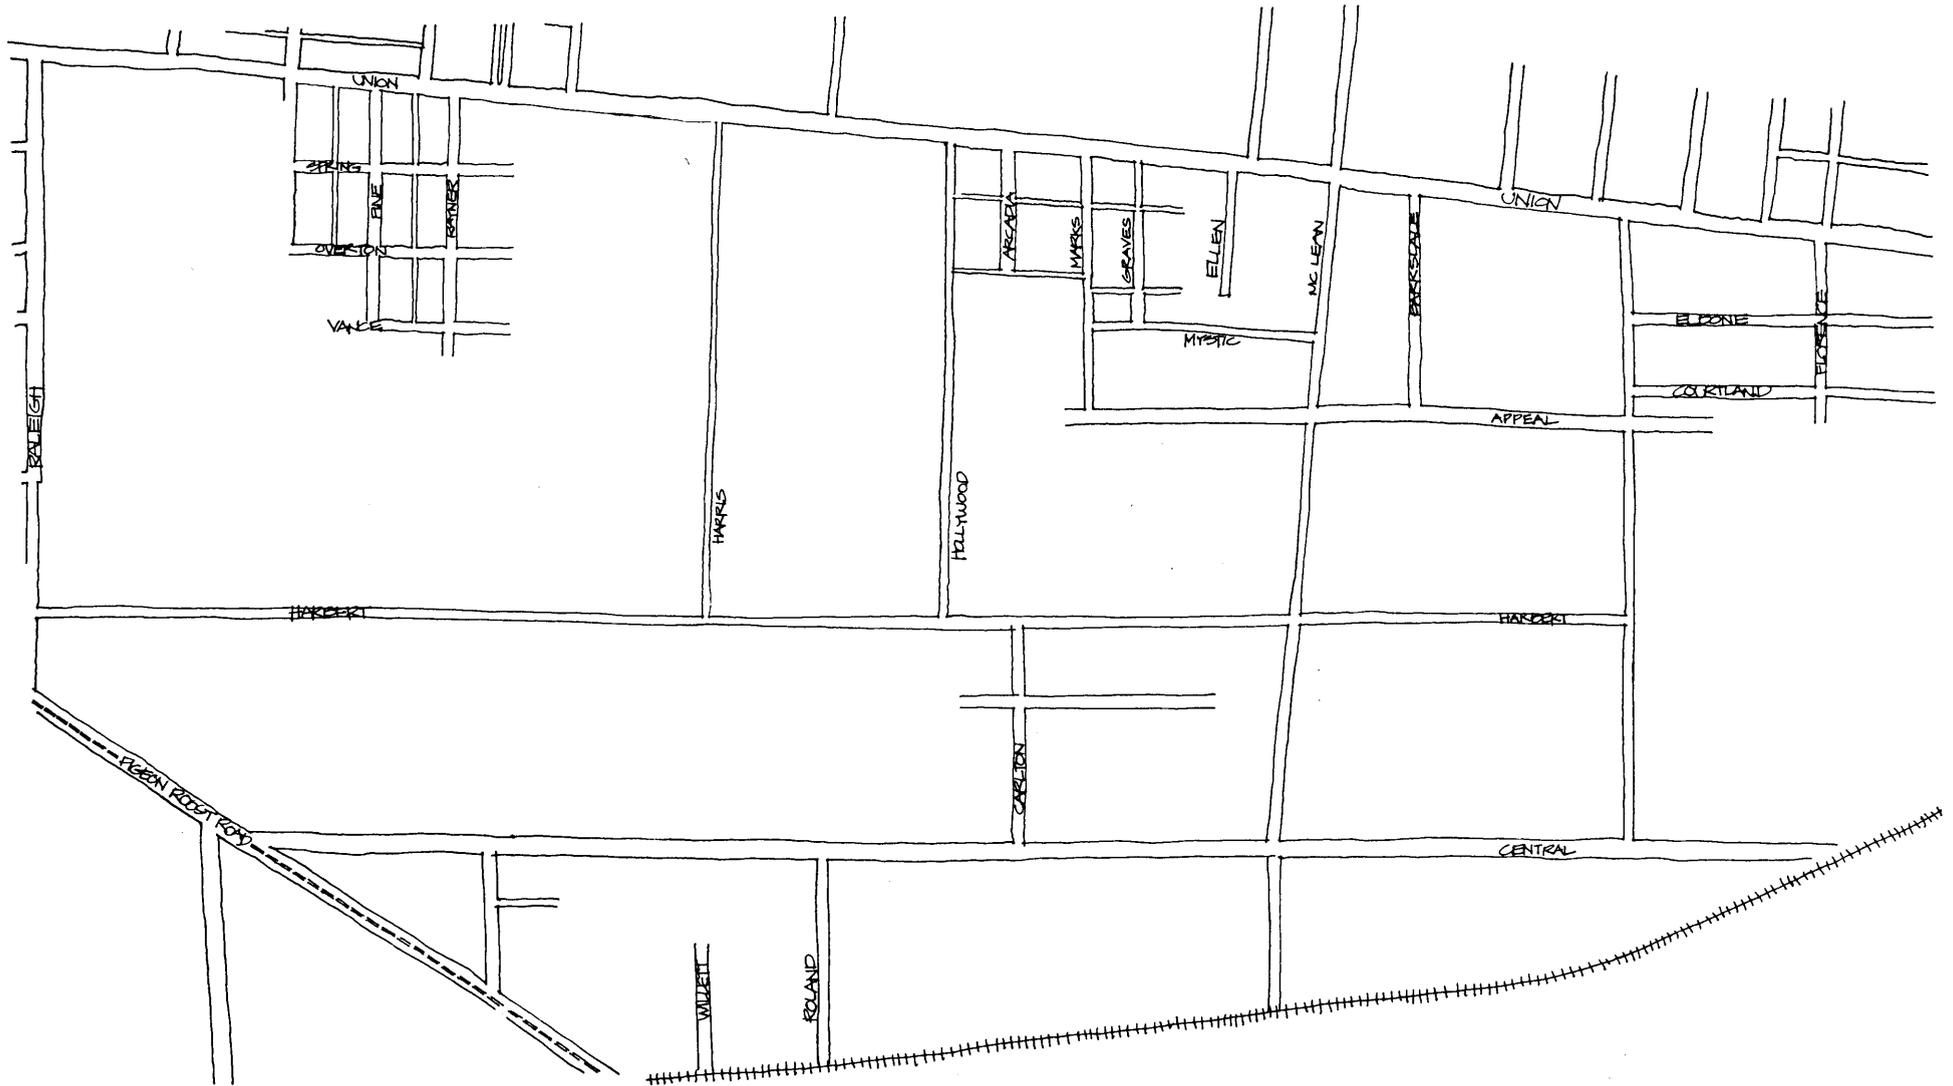

The northern boundary was drawn so as to exclude the commercial land uses fronting on Union Avenue. The western boundary coincides with the eastern boundary of the Annesdale Park Historic District. The southern boundary was drawn to exclude the industrial areas along the N.C. and St. L. railroad, and the eastern boundary, along the west side of Rembert St., responds both to the Pollard Study and to the offset in the east-west streets which occurs at their intersection with Rembert.
