PHYSICAL DESCRIPTION: The Stationmaster's House is a diminutive, natural shingled, 1-1/2 story, 3-bay gable-roofed building. Its principal, non-gabled (street) facade is entirely obscured by a screened porch whose roof is supported by turned posts, painted dark green to match the rest of the trim. A slightly larger ell of similar height to the main section is joined to its rear at right angles. One of this modest building's most noticeable features is its lack of foundation, which, together with its pine grove setting beside the railroad right-of-way, evokes contemporary resort development. Its mismatched, multiple paneled windows, often distinctly oversized for the scale of the rest of the building, are also notable.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE: The Stationmaster's House achieves historical significance as one of only five structures associated with the railroad in Harrisville which survive. In addition to its link with one of the community's most important developments, the coming of the railroad and its social and economic impact on this previously isolated group of settlements, it is the only stationmaster's house still extant and the only surviving railroad building used then, as now, as a residence. Substantially unchanged in appearance, it satisfies Criterion A of the National Register of Historic Places.
