DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The present brick and adobe church, planned by Father Jose Bernardo Sanchez, was erected in 1808-1813. The facade is without flanking bell towers, and its soft-textured whitewashed brick is broken only by coarse moldings surrounding door and window, with a curved parapet at the top. The dominant architectural feature is a four-story campanario or belfry standing almost free of the side wall of the church. Restored on the basis of a sketch made by Major Churchill during the Mexican War, it has a rough base, tapered silhouette, and tiered arches for the five bells.

The timber-roofed nave is typical of most simple type of mission churches. The plan is a long, narrow rectangle, 26 by 159 feet, with no transepts or distinctive architectural features, other than a low chancel rail, between the nave and sanctuary. The floor is of red tiles and the pews were installed in 1931. The thick walls are unbroken except by a door at the right, leading to the patio, and the high windows, with their splayed reveals and plank shutters. The original roof timbers, over 30 feet long, were brought from the inland mountains 60 miles distant. To the left of the front entrance is a small baptistry, and over the entrance the customary choir loft.

In 1931, when thorough restoration was begun, the front wall, the front buttress wings, the base of the campanario, the baptistry arch, and a small part of the sidewalls were still standing. The remainder of the church is a reconstruction. The heavy wooden lintels of the doorways are also of original timbers, but the doors themselves and all other woodwork are handcarved redwood duplicates of the originals. The restoration of 1931 is perhaps unauthentic in details, but in general feeling it gives a good picture of the simpler type of mission architecture.

Little remains of the monastic buildings at San Diego, but a typical arcaded corridor has been restored, with its tiled floor, beamed ceiling, and row of simple arches resting on square piers. Adobe ruins reveal the location and extent of the original patio, and a fine stone dam three miles above the mission indicates the highly developed irrigation system that the mission employed during the days of its prosperity.

Buildings included in the mission complex are the church, friar's cell, mission school, mission museum. A small visitors center has been built but it does not add to the national significance of the landmark.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

San Diego Mission Church, built in 1808-1813, is an excellent example of the simpler type of architecture utilized in most California mission churches.

HISTORY

San Diego de Alcalá Mission, founded by Father Junipero Serra, July 16, 1769, on Presidio Hill in San Diego, was the first of the 21 California missions. In 1774, Serra moved the mission 6 miles to its present location, both to free his Indian neophytes from the adverse influence of the San Diego presidial garrison and to obtain a location affording more water for agricultural purposes. The first wooden church, erected at the new site in 1774, and other mission buildings were burned during the great Indian uprisings of 1774. The second church, an adobe building with thatched roof, was built in 1777 and this was replaced by an even larger adobe church in 1780. The construction of the fourth and existing church was started in 1808 and completed in 1813. The mission was secularized by the Mexican Government in 1834 and the church soon became a roofless ruin, which was sold in 1846. The U.S. Army then occupied the mission for the next 15 years and some repairs were made to the church. In 1862, the United States Government returned the mission buildings and 22 acres of land to the Catholic Church. For some 20 years after 1887 the mission was used as an Indian school and in 1924 a children's home for boys was established at the site. Restoration of the church began in 1930-31 and on February 2, 1941, the restored structure was rededicated as a parish church.
