The Gassaway Mansion is said to have been designed by Minnie Gassaway after she took a correspondence course in architecture. It is a three-story building with a full basement and is constructed of random bond stone masonry. The facade is characterized by a massive Neoclassical Revival portico featuring a decorative frieze supported by six Doric columns. A bracketed cornice with dentil molding highlights the pediment which features a Palladian window. The remainder of the building is a blend of Neo-Gothic and Neoclassical styles. Asymmetrical, the house features a Neo-Gothic castellated tower, two rooftop patios, an enclosed arcade with leaded glass, and a massive porte-cochere on its rear elevation. Interior features include floors inlaid with walnut, hand-molded plaster ceilings, and Significance: One of Greenville's most unusual buildings, the Gassaway Mansion is representative of the exuberance and prosperity of the 1920's and derives significance from its eclectic architecture. The building is also significant for its association with Walter Gassaway, a prominent member of Greenville's burgeoning textile manufacturing industry. Involved with several textile operations, Gassaway was president and treasurer of the Isaqueena Mills, located in Central, South Carolina. He served as president of the Farmer's Bank at Central and was the organizer and longtime cashier for the American Bank of Greenville, an institution which served a large portion of the railroad and textile industry in the area.
