Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Russell-Heath House (c. 1830, significantly remodeled c. 1906) is located in the rural community of Stoneboro in northern Kershaw County. The house is architecturally significant as a renovation of a late Federal residence to reflect an eclectic early twentieth century style.

Additional Information

The main block of the house is a two-story, rectangular structure with a lateral gable roof and a one-story, gable-roof wing. The building has wooden clapboard siding with a brick pier foundation. It has a three-bay east (main) facade with a central entry, single door with transom, flanked by paired windows on both floors. This facade has a projecting portico with four, square, freestanding, double-height, granite pillars (each a single piece of approximately twenty-foot quarried stone) with granite abacuses and a two-over-two-light double-hung sash window in the pedimented gable. A slightly recessed porch is located on the first floor and a cantilevered balcony on the second floor. Both feature balustrades composed of turned balusters and square posts extending the length of the portico. A granite staircase descends from the porch to the lawn. A one-story, L-shaped, hipped roof porch in the ell has been enclosed and covered with asbestos siding. The house has four chimneys: three exterior wall chimneys in the main block have two-story, cut granite block shafts with brick stacks and corbeled stacks. The interior brick chimney has a corbeled cap. All windows have been replaced (c. 1906) with two-over-two double-hung sash, and most doors have large glass panels and egg and dart molding. Solid granite piers are located outside the north facade where a wooden terrace was located until the mid-twentieth century.

The major exterior changes in the c. 1906 renovation were the replacement of the porch with present double-height portico, addition of the east terrace, changing the single windows on the east facade, the removal of the southwest chimney of the main block its replacement with two paired windows in the present dining room, and the rebuilding of the exterior chimneys.

The main block of the house originally had a central hall double pile plan (still evident on the second floor). The interior plan of the first floor

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Russell-Heath House is significant as an example of an early twentieth century eclectic alteration of an early nineteenth century Federal farmhouse, and for its association with Stewart W. Heath, a prominent businessman of Lancaster and Kershaw Counties.

It was built c. 1830 by William Russell, Jr., and passed through a succession of owners until 1869, when it was acquired by James R. Magill (1828-1907), a prominent farmer and politician of Kershaw County. Magill served a term in the South Carolina House of Representatives and several terms in the South Carolina Senate from 1887 to 1893, and also served as postmaster of Russell Place/Magill Post Office, on this property, from 1871 to 1886. In 1905 he sold the house to Stewart W. Heath (1871-1926), who operated a granite quarry approximately two miles north of this property (which eventually gave the community its present name of Stoneboro). Though the granite was first transported by wagons to Heath Springs, in 1906 Heath built a six-mile railroad which ran northeast from the quarry to the town. Soon after he acquired the property, Heath made significant interior and exterior alterations, including the unusual replacement of the original portico columns with granite pillars. Both the operation of Stoneboro quarry and Heath's ownership of the house were short-lived, as Heath declared bankruptcy in 1913 and moved to Fairfield County. The property later passed to Springs Banking and Mercantile Company and then to Elliott White Springs, prominent textile entrepreneur. In 1939 it was purchased by John H. Small and his son J.A. Small. The younger Small's widow lives in the house today. (1) was partially redesigned during the c. 1906 renovation to the present, late nineteenth century open plan. The walls in the central hall and between the present living room and dining room were removed, creating a large space bisected by an L-shaped staircase with built-in seating nook and columnar divider. The one-story rear ell contains two rooms. Original Federal mantels, from the period of construction, remain in the upstairs bedrooms and two rooms of the first floor. The northeast room in the main block has a particularly fine Federal denticulated and gougework mantel. The main living-dining space has features from the c. 1906 remodeling such as beaded-board detailing and a large faux granite mantel. Another stuccoed brick corbeled mantel from this period is located in the rear ell. Other interior evidences (beaded-board wainscot and ceilings) of the c. 1906 renovation are found throughout.

The grounds surrounding the house were extensively landscaped with cedar, mock orange, oak trees, and smaller flowering bushes and plants (mostly destroyed by Hurricane Hugo, 21-22 September 1989), and landscape features such as granite and wood picket fences and granite borders. The majority of these granite gate posts, fence posts, and coping remain, delineating the boundaries of planting beds and walkways.

Located to the west and south of the house are two, small, early twentieth century, vertical plank sheds which are contributing resources associated with the property.
